Winston Churchill Speaks
Of Home Rule to Belfast

Churchill photo by American Press Association.

A THREATENED outbreak of the old feud between Irish Unionists and Irish Home Rulers on the occasion of Winston Churchill's speech at Belfast on the new home rule measure was averted through a fortunate combination of circumstances. The original purpose of Mr. Churchill was to speak in Ulster hall, the building in which his father, Lord Randolph Churchill, delivered his famous speech opposing an earlier home rule bill, in the course of which he said, "Ulster will fight, and Ulster will be right." Mr. Churchill abandoned this intention, a large force of soldiers was thrown into the city and a steady downpour of rain discouraged any violent demonstration, although the weather did not prevent a great audience of Nationalists assembling in the tent which was pitched for the meeting. Mr. Churchill spoke at length, defining the government program for Ireland, and was supported by John Redmond, who so dominates Irish politics in the British parliament and at home that he is derisively called the "king of Ireland" by his Ulsterite enemies. The first lord of the admiralty (which is Mr. Churchill's official title) will be recognized in our illustration by his characteristic gesture, extending the right arm to its full length. The other photograph is that of Mr. Redmond.

can eat. The feast lasts for hours, and as the big party troops out of the banquet room they shout: "Long live Antonio Mancini!" Another eccentricity of this great painter is that his one idol is his father. Mancini says the most of the pleasure he gets from the large prices he is paid for his pictures is that he can spend money to make the old father happy. One of his famous pictures is of his father. He is his "father's boy." He forgets he is a man with a great reputation and treats his father as he did when he was a struggling art student. His first impulse on seeing his father enter his studio is to embrace him in the same way he did when a child. Mancini explains that his father struggled and made many sacrifices to enable him to get his art education. Now, if these "eccentricities" show Mancini to be insane give us more such mad painters. We have heard much of "the eccentricities of genius," but few of this sort. Psychologists and pathologists may disagree as to what is sanity or insanity. But— A great man who loves the common people and who shares his successes with them and who dearly loves the old father who for his sake in the days of privation ate many short dinners—why, he is glorious, sane or insane.

Making of Character.

To endure injustice without answering it with hatred, to endure grief without having the spirit broken, to endure disappointment and yet to go on cheerfully—these things make character.

SANE OR INSANE.

Rome and Paris are asking, "Is the painter Antonio Mancini mad or only a genius?" Certainly he is a genius. His pictures bring big prices, and he never has to solicit orders. Some of his critics hail him as the coming great painter, and others say his eccentricities point to insanity. These are the "eccentricities." He cares nothing about high society. Nothing attracts him except the common people, whom he loves and finds interesting. He finds them less spoiled, more natural. He studies life with the veneer of—down to the flesh, bones, sinews and blood. Beneath, at the heart of things, he finds their disappointments, joys, sorrows, and puts them on canvas. Moreover— He has his studio above a stable among plain dwellings. When he celebrates the completion of a picture he does so by treating the entire neighborhood to as much macaroni as they
