Eastham Argues Against Revised City Charter

The following in substance are the arguments presented by O. W. Eastham in relation to the revised city charter, to be voted upon next Monday, at a meeting held at the commercial club last Monday.

In submitting the new charter, the committee appointed by the council to draft it has offered their argument in its support.

This committee consists of five members to name one of its own number mayor, who shall be subject to immediate removal by their should any act of his happen to displease them.

The proposed charter provides for five councilmen. Hence three men, constituting a majority of the council, are to have absolute and unlimited authority in conducting the city's affairs.

I contend that within a very short time, under such a triumvirate as we are about to create, the citizens of Oregon City will have little more voice in the government that effects them vitally than a galley slave had in the days of ancient Rome.

Political assets absolutely under the domination of three men. We are urged that men are too righteous to do such things. But the history of hundreds of American cities teaches us that men most frequently do such things where opportunity offers.

Regardless of whether results are good or bad our people will not endure this arbitrary power. They will not continue to submit to authority that does not spring from themselves.

I have attempted that under the proposed charter our city government in a short time, would make no pretense of being representative, but I have not yet mentioned its fundamentally most objectionable feature.

In addition to the purposes just mentioned, and of greater importance our city government establishes our innumerable civil and personal rights and privileges.

I believe that the spirit of the age demands that we place man before the Dollar. This issue is the terrific undercurrent that is agitating the whole nation today.
