

How He Felt.
"You seem rather flushed this morning," said the druggist.
"Yes; I took two bottles of your medicine."
"And you feel like a new man."
"I do. To prove it I am going to lick the man who sold it to me. Or with your coat!"

Black Chip and White Plumes

The much over worked, willow plume is a thing of yesterday, having gone to a well-deserved rest in the grave of styles passe. In its place have come the snorette, long popular, but this year on the very crest of the wave; and the always beautiful, always serviceable ostrich plume, both curled and uncurled. A graceful arrangement of the curled plumes is achieved in the hat sketched above. This model was of the fine black chip, having a high crown and wide indented brim with most becoming curves. This hat is entirely untrimmed except for the bank of white feathers massed at the left of the brim and drooping gracefully over the crown.

A WORK OF GENIUS

before, the manuscript of which had been lost. He read on, and as chapter after chapter was turned he began to wonder if he could have really been the author, so far above what he supposed he could do was the work he read. When he had finished he was repaid for all he had suffered in the degradation of an unrecognized genius.

All the world was talking about the new novel written by "Q." the only name given on the title page. The lost manuscript had turned up in the publishing house where it had been offered, and, since no owner could be found and the author's name was not on it, some one was designated to look it over. A favorable report was made of it, and the concern decided to publish it and pay the author his royalty if he ever turned up. He did turn up eventually; but, since there were several claimants for the authorship and he could not prove his case, he got nothing.

Hearing that his old friend Thriftleigh had gone into business for himself, was getting rich and had married, Bonnycastle looked him up. Thriftleigh, though it was after 8 o'clock in the evening, was still at business, but Mrs. Thriftleigh received the visitor. She was a skinny woman, much over-dressed, her fine clothes failing to make a commonplace person look either comely or refined.

"My name is Bonnycastle, Mrs. Thriftleigh, I knew your husband well some twelve or fourteen years ago."
"I remember you very well, Mr. Bonnycastle. I'm Evelyn Forbes. Where have you been all this time?"
Bonnycastle looked at her in astonishment, it not with horror. She was his love and the heroine of his work of genius.

A Mystery Unraveled

By MARY G. COLBY

My father died before my mother, and at her death a woman who had been in the family kept up the house and took care of me. I was then a girl of ten, not old enough to know anything about my affairs or why Miss Meade assumed the position she occupied. She was not an agreeable person, as I remember her in those days, but she was all I had in the world to love, and I tried to love her.

She gave me to understand that she had promised my mother at her death she would take care of me and bring me up.

The only person who ever to my knowledge came to see her was a smooth faced professional looking man, who used to have long conversations with her. After awhile I learned that his name was Cheatham and that he was an attorney. There was something repellent about him, and whenever he came to the house I took pains to keep out of his way.

One thing did not coincide with Miss Meade's statement that she was supporting me. This was that while she was miserly with regard to herself she was liberal with regard to me. I had all the expensive clothing I wished and was never denied anything needed or coveted. I was educated at the best schools and at sixteen was sent to a finishing school. One thing Miss Meade positively forbade—I was not allowed to visit any of my schoolmates.

The day before I was eighteen years old Mr. Cheatham called to see Miss Meade, and they had a discussion, which, judging from their earnestness, must have been a very important one. I heard Mr. Cheatham say, "If you'll leave it to me I can bring it out all right without any great risk; if you manage it as you propose you'll wreck yourself and me too."

The words made no impression on me at the time, for I supposed they referred to some private matter between the lawyer and Miss Meade that did not concern me. Afterward I thought a great deal about them. When I came of age, and especially after this interview, I noticed that Miss Meade was very much absorbed about something and appeared worried. To be worried was unusual with her, she being one of the most composed persons I ever met.

I was now old enough to wonder where the money that was spent on me and I was spending came from. I put a few leading questions to Miss Meade, which she parried. I began to think there was some mystery in our relations, but was not prepared to insist on knowing anything she did not tell me of her own free will. Having brought up with the idea that I owed everything to her, I did not care to risk "killing the goose that laid the golden egg."

One day when she was not at home I wished for something from the store-room. She always kept the room locked, and no one knew where the key was except herself. In a box containing metal odds and ends was a bunch of keys. I tried them one by one till I found one that would unlock the door I wished to pass. Protruding from a desk was a paper, which I possessed myself of, and found it to be a letter written by my father to my mother before they were married declaring that he had given her up, since he was poor and she possessed a princely fortune.

This was astonishing news to me. How could it be that I was dependent upon one who had been my mother's household manager and must have after my father's death taken a part in the management of his affairs. I began to surmise an explanation. I had not heard either that my mother had been rich or had lost her property. It looked to me that the money I was spending must be derived from that fortune my father referred to. The more I thought about the matter the further I went in my inferences till I began to suspect that Miss Meade had taken advantage of my having fallen into her hands when a child to get her clutches on my mother's fortune.

I confess I did not know how to move in the matter. Had I been a man it would have been easier, but for a girl not far past eighteen I could see no way of uncovering the mystery.

Keeping my suspicions from Miss Meade, I resolved to secure advice. The father of one of my schoolmates was a lawyer, and through her I secured an interview with him. He got all the information I could give him about my father and mother and promised to look the matter up. It was not long before through his daughter he asked me to call upon him, and when I did so he told me that my mother had died leaving a great deal of unproductive property, which was now yielding a fine income.

And this was the money on which I was living and procuring all I wished for. But what was Miss Meade's object in telling me that I was dependent upon her?

My lawyer cautioned me to conceal the fact that I had this knowledge and went to work to investigate my property. He found that for years Miss Meade, whom my mother had left my guardian, aided by Cheatham, had been endeavoring to involve the estate in debt to her. In time they would absorb the whole property.

My lawyer put a stop to this and by threatening criminal proceedings succeeded in recovering the whole of my fortune.

CATTLE MARKET IS STRONG AND STEADY

The Portland Union Stock Yards Company reports as follows: Receipts for the week have been, Cattle 1656; calves 977; hogs 2122; sheep 7000; and horses 2.

The cattle market has been strong and steady throughout the week. Good steers were not plentiful and buyers had to fill their requirements from medium grade offerings. Butcher stock was a feature of the cattle market.

The hog market was characterized by an advance of 40 per cent on the week and by the arrival of the first shipment of eastern hogs since early in January. This is the period of the year between the closing of the winter's feed and the appearance of stubble fed hogs, and in consequence the local has fallen off. There are quite a good many hogs in the country, however, and with plenty of grain for finishing purposes an adequate number of hogs for the markets needs is looked for from local territory.

Large offerings of sheep caused a break in the market 15 cents to 20 cents. The first Mount Adams lambs arrived Friday and although they sold at a good price, killers had largely taken care of their needs in the early part of the week from a more inferior quality.

Prevailing Oregon City prices are as follows:

- DRIED FRUITS—(Buying)—Prunes on basis of 6 to 8 cents.
- Fruits, Vegetables.
- HIDES—(Buying)—Green hides 6c to 7c; salted 7c; dry hides 12 cents to 14c; sheep pelts, 30c to 55c each.
