Three Quarter Floating Rear Axle of Overland Model 69

The Overland Model 69 three-quarter floating rear axle has a number of important advantages over the semi-floating rear axle design which is used in most cars of low or medium price.

The semi-floating axle consists of a rear axle housing, the differential, and the two axle shafts, with bearings between the housing and the shafts. The weight of the car and its load is carried half and half on the axle shafts and on the housing. Consequently, the axle shaft has to do double duty. It has to carry part of the load and also must turn the driving wheels. The result is that the bearings are subjected to heavy stresses, and that there is a great amount of friction, and that any deformation of the axle housing and any bending of the axle shafts, no matter how slight, immediately effects the alignment of the bearings.

It is entirely different with the OVERLAND THREE-QUARTER FLOATING REAR AXEL. Here the load is carried by the axle housing which is reinforced by an inner steel tube riveted and keyed to the housing proper.

The rear wheel roller bearings run on the hardened seamless steel tube which projects from the axle housing on either side. As a consequence the differential bearings and the wheel bearings do not come in contact with the axle drive shafts at all. These drive shafts, which are of special heat-treated chrome-nickel steel, only have to turn the wheels. The differential bearings, therefore, have to bear only their own stresses and the broad, elastic HYATT REAR WHEEL BEARINGS carry the rear load of the car. The rear-wheel bearings moreover, are in the vertical plane of the spokes; they receive the load straight from above, and need no adjustment whatever. Side thrust is taken up by an adjustable ball-thrust bearing on either side of the differential.

The only difference there is between the full floating rear axle—such as is used in the Overland Model 71—and the new OVERLAND THREE-QUARTER FLOATING AXEL of Model 69 is that in the full floating axle the rear wheel is fastened to the axle housing, while in the THREE-QUARTER FLOATING type of Model 69 the wheel is fastened to the axle shaft. But in the way they carry the load, and in the independence and safety of the bearings, the THREE-QUARTER FLOATING AXEL and the full-floating type are alike.

There are other points in favor of the new Overland axle design.

In the semi-floating rear axle considerable trouble is often caused by the differential lubricant leaking through the axle housing, past the axle shafts and into the brakes. In our THREE-QUARTER FLOATING AXEL this is avoided by the use of heavy felt washers which are pressed against the axle tube by a spiral spring.

The brakes mounted on the new axle are worthy of particular attention. They also are of new design and very large for a car of the size of the Model 69. The diameter of the drums is 13 3/8 inches and their width, 2 7/8 inches, with a brake band 2 1/4 inches wide.

The brakes are of gradual yet powerful application. The more often used service brake is adjustable in two ways, once at the adjustment sector, for coarse adjustment, and again by shortening the service brake band levers, for fine adjustment.

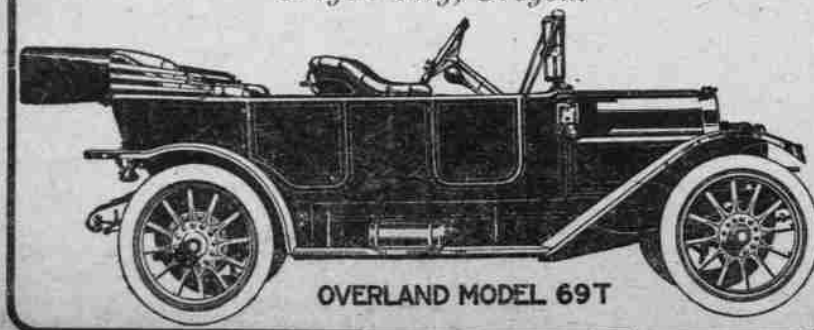

Every part of Axle mechanism is easily and quickly reached. Thrust bearings, differential bearings and the large bevel gear may be adjusted without difficulty.

In distinction to many other cars, the Overland combines the transmission and the differential mechanism into one unit; in other words, the transmission is "on the rear axle," instead of amidships. The result is more rigid construction and a saving of much engine power which in other cars is wasted in passing the power from the transmission to the differential. In the Overland transmission the shafts are short and all gear changes are made with short and quick movements of the gear-shifting lever in the center of the car.

While the OVERLAND REAL AXEL is but a single detail, it is typical of the remainder of the OVERLAND CONSTRUCTION and design. Everything is as it should be and the whole car is an expression of THE WILLIS-OVERLAND COMPANY'S policy to see, first, how good a car they can make; second, how many of them they can build—which is only another way of saying QUALITY FIRST, QUANTITY NEXT.

HOW ONE WOMAN WON

Her Health and Strength Back Again by the Use of Cardui.

Tampa, Fla.—In a letter from this city, Mrs. E. C. Corum writes: "I was all weakened and worn out with womanly troubles. My husband brought me some Cardui as a tonic, and, from the first day, it seemed to help."

I had almost lost my reason, but, thanks to Cardui, I did not. Soon, I felt and looked like a new woman. I think the remedy is wonderful. I recommend it to my friends, for I have received great benefit from it."

Cardui acts specifically on the weakened womanly organs, strengthening the muscles and nerves, and building them up to health.

It helps to refresh the worn-out nervous system and relieves the effects of overwork, both mental and physical.

Fifty years' successful use fully prove the merit of this purely vegetable, tonic remedy for women.

In every community, there live some who have been benefited by Cardui.

The beneficial effects of this time-tested woman's remedy, soon show themselves in many different ways. Try it.

Heart to Heart Talks

By JAMES A. EDGERTON

LOVE YOUR ENEMIES.
 Have you heard the story of James J. Lynch and Thomas Morris? It is a real life story, but is better than most fiction.

Thomas Morris was an iron manufacturer in Yonkers, N. Y. Mr. Lynch is a contractor in the same city.

Originally the two were warm friends, but business disagreements arose, and they became bitter enemies. They did not speak for years. All efforts of mutual friends to bring about a reconciliation were vain.

Neither wanted to hear the name of the other, and their families and friends for the most part respected their wishes.

Recently Mr. Morris fell dangerously ill. The doctors pronounced his disease anæmia and said the only thing that would save him was transfusion of blood from the veins of a stronger person.

In some way this came to the ears of Mr. Lynch. He gave no sign that he heard.

But the heaven worked. The old friendship of youth reasserted itself. Still, he gave no sign.

On Sunday morning James J. Lynch went to church. What he heard there is not on record. Possibly it was the text, "Love your enemies."

At any rate, after church he walked straight to the residence of Thomas Morris. The maid who answered the bell was so amazed at the sight of him that she could scarcely open the door.

To the physicians in attendance Lynch briefly announced that he had come to furnish the blood the sick man needed. As Mr. Lynch is an athlete, despite his years, a better subject could not have offered.

On entering the room where lay his enemy James J. Lynch spoke no word. Mr. Morris was so low he could not have spoken had he desired. But his eyes held a mute question and wonder as they rested on his foe.

Down on the bed by his side that foe laid himself. The proper incisions were made, and the blood from the strong man soon coursed through the veins of the one at the threshold of death. In a short time the patient showed a pronounced gain in strength and hopes were entertained for his ultimate recovery, but there was a relapse, and death came a few days later. His last hours were sweetened by the knowledge that a bitter enemy had been wiped out.

And what of James J. Lynch? He will in time regain his lost blood and his strength, and he will be stronger in courage, spirit and soul than ever before.
