President Wilson Reading His First Message to Congress

HIS picture makes history. It records one of the unusual events in the official life of the United States. It shows President Woodrow Wilson reading his first message to congress before both branches seated in the house. Not in 112 years had a president of our country done that Washington did it. So did the second president, John Adams. Wilson reverted to this old custom because he said he wanted to get in closer touch with the national legislators to show that he was human and not a mere state machine, as he himself explained to congress.
