THE PRESIDENT'S Some newspapers have recently gone into hysteria THE TULSA the Mexican situation. They fall back upon the old moss backed attitude of history to sustain him in the position that he has assumed.

able that the chief executive of this land now has the nerve to back up some of the threats that have been made for the past several presidential administrations and that he can ACT as well as talk. On account of this old song is a general nuisance. The man who is guided by it, who allows his actions old methods of cultivation. to be controlled and his thought hampered by moss covered histories and mouldy law books will never branch out into the fields where original thought is necessary to meet the crucial tests that come.

But, casting aside this question, the history of this country will show that ether presidents have pointed the way to the path that Wilson has taken. In the days when Monroe was president, his message to the congress of the United States in which he announced that doctrine that has since guided the political affairs of this country relative to the southern nations, his language was the opening wedge in the protectorate that the United States has estab-

Following conclusively to its logical ending, there can be no other way out but for the United States to guide the affairs of the south and for it to take a stand on matters that effect the general welfare of all of the nations on our other border, especially when those affairs concerns us as deeply as do the sit

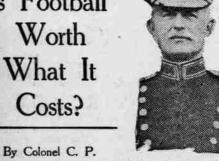

"We can view in no other light," says the presidential message in the early days of American history, "any interferance on the part of any European power than as an affront at the United States"-or words to that effect. The message could not have been stronger. It pointed the way. It lighted the path that all future presidents of this country have followed, whether they be of the republican or the democratic fold. There is precedent for you. It is the light that has blazed down the pathway of our political relations with our southern neighbors. It guided the hand of Wilson as it has guided the hand of every other president.

In the days of the Civil War, when the storm clouds were breaking over these United States and when the country was torn from one end of the land to the other by factions and by parties, Abraham Lincoln took several steps that broke the law of precedent and that verged out into the ficiel where others had not yet gone. Almost every president that we have had has, at some time or other, taken a step that broke the law of precedent and that met the crisis that came before him. Guided by precedent, hemmed in by old moss back theories of government, locked by notions that would have held us in chains to the British lion and that would still leave us the original thir teen colonies scattered along a rock bound coast, this country would have

> Wilson has taken the only stand that he could take. He has seen the sitnation in Mexico. He has been patient, long suffering. He has seen Amcricans made prisoners in filthy jails. He has watched them shot down before a stone wall by Mexican bullets. He has seen the distress and suffering, the factions and war that have spread from one end of that country to the other and has watched the storm clouds as they have brough destruction and devastation worse than the typhoons of the east or the hurricanes of the

It is time that something were done. No longer can the American peoneglects getting the paper to you on time, kindly phone the office. This ple be patient. Not only their interests but the interests of the nations of the world are at stake. The people of the other first rank countries look upon the United States, because of that doctrine ennunciated by President Monroe, to handle the situation there. It remains for American statesmanship, American brains and ingenuity to solve the problems.

Except in the fully arid regions, enough rain and snow fall during the winter and spring to make an ample store of moisture, if taken into the ground and kept there, instead of being permitted to run off the surface. Deep plowing makes a reservoir for this water,, the ground becoming saturated with moisture as far down as the soil is loose enough to absorb it. This water, however, rapidly evaporates from the surface whenever the top soil becomes hard, because of little ducts that form, through which the moisture rises to the surface. Constant cultivation of the surface breaks up these ducts and stops taught to read by his wife. Let us evaporation, thus conserving the moisture for the use of the growing plants. Preserving a dust mulch on the surface is the simple principle of dry farming, added to the deep plowing. Had the corn farmers of western states in this way conserved the moisture which was in the ground when the corn was planted, it would have been ample to mature a good crop.

This is a question which interests consumers as well as farmers. Consumers pay the bill for improper or careless agriculture, just as they do for wastefulness in lumbering, expensive handling of coal, inefficient manufacturing of any of the things for which they must pay an added price because of poor methods. This is why the spread of agricultural knowledge at government expense is a work beneficial to all the people, and not alone to the farmers. Dry farming knowledge, therefore, something we have been accustomed to consider as of interest and value only to the residents of the Rocky Mountain littoral, from Wyoming to the Texas Panhandle, becomes of equal interest to both the farmers and the people of other sections, when they under-

Where Cato Was Remembered. In 1798 the little settlement around Fort Schuyler, New York, aspired to the dignity of a village charter and the question of a new name arose. A number of the citizens met in Bagg's tavern to discuss the matter, and it was decided to draw lots for the name. each person present to deposit in a hat a slip of paper with his choice written thereon. The first name drawn out was to be the one accepted. Thir teen slips were deposited, and the first one drawn forth chanced to be that written by Erastus Clark, a man of scholarly interests, as was illustrated by his choice. He had done honor to his favorite Roman, Cato, by inscrib ing on his slip the home of Cato's adoption in Africa. Thus was Utica. N. Y. named.-Ladies' Home Journal.
