

A Chase for Millions

By GISELLE D'UNGER

THE editorial rooms of the Daily Pencilings presented a scene of activity. Men of brains and energy contributed their best efforts to gain the favor of the public, and were amply rewarded by the encomiums passed upon the broad platform established some 20 years. Vigorous and concise were the summaries of volumes of statistics, reducing them to a condensation that practically benefited the reader.

Two young men were holding a conversation in a remote corner where the desks were not so thickly placed. One was tall and of a serious manner, while the other was a typical Bohemian, careless, happy-go-lucky, artistic, clever and a dare devil as to adventure in assignments. He was discussing the latest sensation, the reported engagement of a prominent social woman to a titled grandee.

"Blake, all women are conquered by the glitter of gold. It's a case of if you can't get no money, you needn't come round." Grace Ward knows which side her bread's buttered on, she remarked in a contemptuous tone.

"You are all wrong, Johnson," returned Blake, "winning under the other's careless words." "Miss Ward was not dazzled by the glitter of gold. Opportunity is like a diamond in the rough; it is spurned by man in its crude state, but covered when it illumines the jeweled gates of Happiness and Content in the land of Successful Attainment. Miss Ward appreciates opportunity, and, furthermore, the nobleman has intellectuality and manhood to recommend him."

"Where did Miss Ward live before the Fairbanks took her up?" queried Johnson.

"She came from Kings Kettle, near Ladybank, Fifeshire, Scotland, near quite young—but the time flies, Johnson, and I must finish this," was the reply of Blake.

"All right, Ned, I must be going, too." That last edition of yesterday lacked a romance; I am going out to find one—in the slums."

Frank Johnson nodded to the older man, buttoned his ulster against the winter blasts and stepped off, whistling softly the latest popular air.

"One man hit in that quarter once, I believe—accounts for the precise knowledge of her former home. Well, she's a beauty and Lord Alfred will have no cause to sigh over a good figure-head for his household. That's the dear Four Hundred tighten their grasp upon a poverty-stricken nobleman with a bedimmed title reminds me of nothing more than the Laocoon. I declare, young, innocent girls are trained, taught to this exchange of their charming youth for the palled shades of age, and its attendant serpentine coils of a title, a decayed ruin of a chateau or castle, and they submit so tenderly. It is beyond me, for these proud, fearless American girls endure hardships known only to themselves."

"Thus ran the thoughts of Johnson as he marched along the thoroughfare, but he was no nearer to solving the mystery than before. Meanwhile Ned Blake was not so mindful of "copy" as he had intimated to Johnson. Memory had reminded him of the days when the letters of Grace Ward had shown to him like a flock of tiny bluebirds breathing love and affection and a happy future. Now all was changed. A misunderstanding, coldness, silence, the advent of Lord Alfred Bruce, impossibilities of friends and—the engagement.

"Johnson is a bright, breezy fellow," reflected Blake, as he leaned his weary head against the chair, "and as sharp as a steel trap. He would make an excellent correspondent of an exploring expedition, as he enjoys adventure. I'll speak to Henderson about him. He is too contemptuous of the follies and foibles of humanity to succeed here. He spots a good story by having a sympathetic or antagonistic chord relative to it. By Jove! I must get out of here and have some air and quiet."

Blake had been working at a terrible pace for months and he was even now straining every nerve to accomplish more than was expected of him, through the feverish restless striving from thoughts of himself. Work was the panacea. What mattered it if he did lie awake night after night conscious of gradual loss of strength for the day's labor, if at the close of the conflict for sleep he fell into a comatose state, neither awake nor sleeping, wherein a delicious, restful languor predominated, granting him floating visions of the woman he loved.

Upon his brow he felt the gentle touch of her cool fingers; he heard her murmur words of pity and tenderness, in low, sweet tones, and for a few moments his soul seemed to leave the body and float with hers, as did Francesca and Paola, through space.

It was worth the hard grind of the wearisome day to welcome night, the wild struggle and once more this delicious and dreamy languor. Surely Paradise could confer no more exquisite sensation than was granted him in this hour of the early dawn. As the sun's rays flashed through the room and the discordant sounds of early traffic broke rudely on this revere, he arose unrefreshed, depressed in spirits, feverishly anxious to take up the duties of the day.

With a sigh of relief, Ned Blake, managing editor, pushed the copy from him, arranged his desk, locked it carefully, summoned a boy and delivered certain instructions. He left the room and in a few moments was on the street where the lights danced and flickered like will of the wisps under the influence of a raw east wind.

On the way to Chicking hall, Blake encountered a crowd. On inquiry he learned of a collision between the cable and a private carriage, and from that description his heart knew that it was Grace Ward who was injured. He beckoned a passing hansom and drove to her home, regardless of all except that he loved her more dearly than ever.

F. A. WERMAN, OF BALTIMORE, SAYS:

Gentlemen:—Being entirely cured of deafness, thanks to your treatment, I will now give you a full history of my case, to be used at your discretion.

About five years ago my right ear began to ring, and this kept on getting worse, until I lost my hearing in this ear entirely.

I underwent a treatment for catarrh, for three months, without any success, consulted a number of physicians, among others, the most eminent ear specialist of this city, who told me that only an operation could help me, and even that only temporarily, that the head noises would then cease, but the hearing in the affected ear would be lost forever.

I then saw your advertisement accidentally in a New York paper, and ordered your treatment. After I had used it only a few days according to your directions, the noises ceased, and to-day, after five weeks, my hearing in the diseased ear has been entirely restored. I thank you heartily and beg to remain Very truly yours,
