VERY MUCH MIXED SOCIETY.

Gentlemanly Burglar a Welcome Visitor in English Society. There has been some complaint in and a riot was averted. aristocratic circles in England that in great country houses there is now found much mixed society.

This has, however, always been the case. A well-known actor passed three days at an historical mansion without knowing either host or hostess; he knew that the marquis and his wife did not speak to one another, and that each would think he was the guest of the

All records of the kind have been surpassed by what has recently taken place in France. A fascinating person has been recently making a round of visits at certain chateaux. He was "well known in society," which means that he was gladly received in it, though nobody knew anything about him.

He lived, when not in town among his friends, in a very luxurious fashion. But all that he seems to have possessed of his own was a set of scientific instruments of burglary. In his possession was also found a portfolio with plans of the interior arrangements of the houses at which he had been stop-

One can imagine a polished forger. Fauntleroy was a most accomplished person, and gave excellent dinners. When he was under sentence of death he was called on by one of his noble friends, who said: "Since you are going to leave us, perhaps you will now tell me where you get that green curacoa from;" but a polished burglar is quite a novelty.

Conceive his thoughts while he is saying soft nothings to the lady he took in to dinner. How he must have eyed her jewelry, and wondered where she kept it! What nights he must have passed flitting from room to room, a habit which, if discovered, he would doubtless have attributed to sleepwalking! How very little must have been known among his fine friends of this gentleman's "relatives and antecedents."-James Payn, in Independ-

Girl Who Can't Speak German Weds a Man Who Knows No English.

There are descendants of Germans in Berks county, Pa., who do not understand a word of English, although they have lived in this country all their lives. One of these is Jacob ing to Lobenstein is so steep that it is impossible to use the ordinary American farming implements drawn by horses. Weinsheimer's principal implement is the kind used in very hilly portions of Germany. He calls it a "karst." It is shaped like a big horseshoe fastened to a wooden handle. With this he digs and stirs up the earth instead of plowing and harrowing it. He also has numerous other small hand implements. With these he raises large quantities of vegetables, wheat, rye, barley, corn, sugar cane, sweet potatoes and grapes. He reaps his grain with a sickle and threshes it with a mallet.

Cupid's dart pierced the heart of the working for a farmer on the hills in the neighborhood, when he was introduced to a Miss March, from Ohio. She was some 20 years younger than he, but that made no difference. The love-making was slow, for the woman could not speak German and he was unable to speak English. But the language of love finally made itself understood between them. He proposed, was accepted, and now a happier couple than Mr. and Mrs. Weinsheimer would be hard to find.

Weinsheimer is a great admirer of pets, such as dogs and cats. He is the owner of a black fox terrier which he says he would not part with for $100 in gold. He is a perfect terror to the anakes and has killed more than 2,000 copperhead and blacksnakes during the last five years.

The boys almost broke their necks in getting away. Reaching over into the pan, the snake took a good drink, and, before the startled printers could secure a club with which to dispatch the reptile, it had disappeared, says the Lacon (III.) Home Journal.

The next day at the same hour the snake came for another drink, and this was repeated the third and fourth days, but the last time it was attacked from the rear by a big black Thomas cat that makes its home at Lester's livery barn, next door. It was a lively fight for a few seconds, but the cat was too much for the snake, although it was fully four feet long, and the reptile made a shoot for the rear of the office. The cat was after it like a streak of lightthe brick wall and disappeared under
