BY MACHINE.

Sheared Sheep—Several Machines in use in Benton.

The shearing of sheep by machinery is largely coming into vogue in Eastern Oregon, according to the dispatches. Of 560,000 pounds of wool sheared in Harney county, most of it, a telegram says, was taken off by machine. Several machines are in use in Benton county this season, and are said to be economical for the purpose. The arrangement is simple, with nothing new or startling about it. The cutting is done on exactly the same principle that a barber cuts hair with a pair of clippers. In the case of the sheep, the power is supplied to the operator of the clippers, while in the hair cutting process the barber's hand is the seat of the motive power. In the first, a big wheel with a crank to it is fitted with cogs that operate on a smaller wheel, which in turn moves a pliable shaft which in turn is attached to the clippers. One man turns the crank and the other applies the clippers to the sheep. Shearing by the method, after a little practice, is said to be considerably swifter, and far more humanitarian. By it the sheep's hide is very rarely broken, although the wool may be clipped off much closer. A dozen of the machines are in use in this county. Originally, they were designed for goat shearing, but they are fast passing into use in the wool industry. In Eastern Oregon electric power or other power is used, and a dozen to 20 pairs of clippers are operated with the result that huge bands of sheep are sheared in a comparatively short time.

TRYING MITCHELL.

What Lawyer Morris Said About it Since the Case Went to Trial.

There is deep concern in Corvallis over the outcome of the Mitchell trial, now in progress at Seattle. Tidings from the court room are generally looked upon as encouraging. It has for instance, been observed in a great many cases where talesmen have been interrogated on the subject during the examination by the attorneys, they have almost invariably declared it to be their opinion that Mitchell did right in killing Creffield. This means that the knowledge of Creffield's teachings has become widely disseminated, and in the state of Washington his doings are looked upon with disfavor. It is known here also that the attorneys for the defense are not in any sense discouraged with the outlook. In a letter written Wednesday evening to a friend in this city, Mr. Morris, senior counsel for Mitchell, said that up to that time, the case had gone pretty much along the lines he had expected, and that he had every hope of an outcome favorable to his client. He added that the prosecution was making a strong fight to secure a conviction, and that the defense was meeting the assault with equal vigor, and that he felt reasonably certain that those struggling in behalf of the Mitchell boy would hold their own in a legal battle.

All Monday, Tuesday Wednesday and Thursday was spent in securing a jury. On the subject of jury, Mr. Morris stated in his letter that he was very well satisfied, although most of the rulings of the court in the process of selecting them had been adverse to the contentions of the defense. It is estimated now that the trial will occupy the greater part of next week. Copies of the Seattle papers received in Corvallis teem with accounts of the trial, to which large space is given up to pictures, incidents and other details of the proceedings.

The discouraging feature of the trial is the attitude of Esther Mitchell and Mrs. Starr, sisters of the defendant. They are apparently still under the Creffield influence and claim to have a revelation that it is God's will that they do not give testimony to aid their brother, whom they insist, should suffer the full penalty of the law. If Mitchell goes to the gallows it will be because of the fanatical testimony of his own sisters. Mrs. Starr went to Seattle determined to aid her brother, but after an interview with her sister, Esther, changed her mind.

The jury was secured last night and the taking of evidence is in progress today. The witnesses for the prosecution are, Maud Hurt, two policemen, two doctors, and a Seattle newspaper reporter. It is expected that their testimony will all be in today, and that the evidence for the defense will begin tomorrow and continue for several days.
