Hardly had the passengers disentangled themselves from the wrecked cars at East Seventh and Multnomah streets jammed into each other in exactly the same manner as those wrecked a block away.

It was exactly 8:10 when car No. 176 rounded the curve at East Seventh and started up Multnomah under full power, the carmen supposing they had a clear track to the next switch, when suddenly the crash came without warning.

Conductor Evans was standing by the side of his motorman, R. L. Smith, and both were thrown from the platform.

Conductor Evan's feet caught in the wreckage of the platform, which was almost instantly jammed flat against the car and he was plunged on his head.

Lloyd Holmes, next to Conductor Evans, was the most seriously injured. He was also standing on the front platform at the time of the collision, and was pushed through the closed door into the car.

Several other passengers were injured by flying glass in different parts of the body that were exposed, such as the hands, neck, head and the face.

The cars were completely smashed, not a whole window remained in either car. The trucks were wrenched, and the bodies of the cars splintered, cracked and bulged.
