

Warriors fall in four at OES

The Daily Astorian

BEAVERTON — Four days after a dramatic Lewis & Clark League playoff win over Portland Christian, the Warrenton volleyball team tried to keep the ball rolling Monday night in a league playoff, winner-to-state match at Oregon Episcopal.

But the Aardvarks had other ideas, as they closed out the Warriors' season in four intense games, 25-19, 25-19, 26-28, 25-19.

The No. 10-ranked Aardvarks began October with a three-game sweep over the Warriors, who were looking to clinch their first spot in the state playoffs since 2009.

"We almost got the win, but unfortunately almost doesn't count," said Warrenton coach Jenny Smith. "We missed out on some opportunities that OES kept giving us."

After the match, Warrenton senior Libby Biel was named first-team all-league, while senior Ally Bentley was second-team and junior Landree Miethe was selected honorable mention.

"What an outstanding group of girls this year," Smith said. "They have worked so hard and started to peak at the right time. Hopefully the younger girls learn from this. It was definitely within our reach."

Tsunami: Many coastal communities are strapped for cash

northern California, Oregon and Washington state, about 21,500 would not have time to reach higher ground if they walk slowly. That goes down to 16,000 if they walk quickly.

Nearly 70 percent of the residents at highest risk are in Washington state communities, followed by Oregon with 29 percent and California with 4 percent.

The state of Washington has identified the need for 55 vertical evacuation structures in low-lying coastal areas in three counties. The school gym in Westport will be the first to be built. The next may be a manmade berm in Long Beach capable of giving refuge to 800 people.

Emergency planners in California are looking into creating some sort of vertical evacuation structure on its northern coast — building a berm or perhaps fortifying an existing tall structure to withstand a big quake and serve as a tsunami refuge. A building would have to be on soil that would not be in danger of liquefying during a major earthquake.

Up and down the coast, officials have been trying to ensure that residents and tourists know how to quickly get to high ground by using designated tsunami evacuation routes.

Newport, on Oregon's central coast, is turning a 90-foot-tall forested hill into a tsunami evacuation area. "Safe Haven Hill," as its being called, will have lighted walkways to the top so evacuees can find their way at night.

A survivor pushes a bicycle on his way to a shelter in Minamisanriku town, Miyagi Prefecture, northeastern Japan, a week after a massive earthquake and resulting tsunami in 2011.

Seaside has some natural high ground for evacuees but it also has bridges likely to collapse during a big earthquake, cutting off escape to thousands of people.

Many coastal communities are strapped for cash, a factor in planning.

Even though Seaside is one of the most vulnerable communities on the Oregon coast, voters rejected a $129 million bond to move three schools to safer ground.

Federal money helped moved high school students out of the tsunami zone in Waldport, on Oregon's central coast, into a new school on high ground. The old school was "smack dab" in the tsunami zone and "had some quake safety issues," said Dennis Sigrist, Oregon's hazard mitigation officer.

In Curry County, on Oregon's border with California, voters two years ago approved a $10 million bond issue to replace an aging hospital that faced closure. The new hospital is going up on the same lot as the old one, in the city of Gold Beach.

Maps dating from the 1990s put the lot outside the projected tsunami zone. But newer maps show it could be swamped by a tsunami, depending on the severity and proximity of the offshore quake.

State emergency managers were alarmed by the site choice.

Jodi Fritts, city administrator for Gold Beach, said alternative sites on high ground are prone to landslides and costs would be prohibitive for putting in roads, sidewalks, and water and sewer lines, especially in a county as poor as Curry.

Fritts argued that with no one able to predict with certainty when the big quake and tsunami will come and how far the tsunami waters will reach, and with the community in desperate need of a modern hospital, going ahead was the right choice.

Chris Goldfinger, author of a study that concluded there is a 37 percent chance of the Cascadia Subduction Zone rupturing in the next 50 years, said he wishes decision-makers "would consider buying an airplane ticket to Japan and

"You have to go there ... to really capture what destructive power means," said Goldfinger, a professor of geology and geophysics at Oregon State University.
