

Relocation: 'I love Astoria, but there is just no room'

Such a storage system allows much more storage in less space, according to the county. The system will also meet the requirements to lock weapons and drugs separately from the other items stored.

"That's where the actual evidence is going to be," Bergin said. "It will all be out there in a secure building."

Under one roof

Compared to the cramped quarters in the Astoria building, the new Sheriff's Office location will have larger meeting and conference rooms. Sergeants and deputies will have their own space to review cases and sort evidence rather than having to share the same room.

The larger space will also offer more privacy for interviews with victims.

Outside, a pole barn is being built to house vehicles, including those used for search and rescue.

Bergin said his office has simply outgrown the current location.

"I love Astoria, but there is just no room," Bergin said. "Let's utilize this building to its fullest potential and let's get us all working together."

A major benefit of moving to the new location at 1190 S.E. Ninth St. is the Sheriff's Office will be working side-by-side with its Parole and Probation Division.

While construction continues, Parole and Probation is temporarily operating out of the former Lum's Auto building in Astoria.

Everything will become more organized once the Sheriff's Office and Parole and Probation start operating out of the same hub, Bergin said.

"We are all under one roof," Bergin said. "We are all here and we are all working together."

the increased minimum wage while larger employers would easily be able to absorb the cost.

"We decided let's try to get this right," Clem said.

The lawmaker said he has seen the narrow profit margins at his family's farm near in Parkdale.

"We want to make sure employees aren't losing their jobs because somebody sells to larger firms or starts to automate," Clem said.

Gov. Kate Brown has expressed support for tax credits to offset small businesses' costs.

"I certainly support the concept," Brown said Wednesday. Tax credits for businesses were "on the table that we negotiated around before the Legislature met," she said.

House Speaker Tina Kotek, D-Portland, has been supportive of pursuing negotiations to come up with a tax credit proposal.

"She's open to a conversation about ways to provide targeted support for small employers, but she hasn't seen a final proposal yet," said Lindsey O'Brien, Kotek's communications director.

The details of the still-evolving draft plan were unclear late Wednesday afternoon. At that point, the proposal had called for giving tax credits to small businesses, nonprofits, and businesses engaged in farming, forestry, fishing, other natural resources production and traded sector manufacturing, starting in July 2017.

Lawmakers were still trying to determine the number of employees that would make an employer eligible. The limit could be as many as 25 employees and as little as 10, Clem said.

The tax credit would reduce the effective wage rate for those employers. The amount would gradually climb in tandem with the minimum wage, reaching up to $2 per hour per employee in July 2022. The proposal could be attached to existing bills that already have passed one of the legislative chambers.

Clem and Davis said their original concept also would have set smaller increases in minimum wage and lifted a ban against setting higher wages in Portland. Both of those proposals were too complex to push through the waning days of the Legislature's 35-day session.

The minimum wage plan, approved earlier this month by both legislative chambers, hikes minimum wages over a period of six years. The amount differs in each of three regions and is set according to a county's median income and cost of living. In Portland, minimum wage will reach $14.75 in the Portland area, $12.50 in rural and coastal counties with struggling economies and $13.50 in the rest of the state by 2022.

Brown said the customized minimum wage plan sparked interest at the National Governors Association's winter meeting Feb. 19-22. Sen. Michael Dembrow, D-Portland, who spearheaded the three-tier plan, said the state's minimum wage plan is a first in the nation.

"The folks also were very excited, frankly, about our three-tier minimum wage that addresses regional economic differences," Brown said Wednesday. "I think there is some discussion about whether this might be a model for other states to replicate that have regional differences like we do in Oregon."

Salmon: Environmental groups say dams are the main culprit

Oregon snowpack was the lowest on record for the 2015 water year, and early runoff exacerbated low flows throughout the Columbia Basin. By July, more than a quarter-million sockeye had died in the Columbia and Snake rivers — at least half the total run, according to reports. One biologist with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration worried mortality could rise to 80 percent.

Environmental groups say dams are the main culprit. Peters did not specifically address the letter sent to Col. Aguilar, but said the Corps is working with NOAA and the state of Idaho on a report detailing what exactly happened in 2015, and ways they can keep the rivers cooler moving forward.

The report will also address fish passage issues on the lower Snake and Columbia dams, Peters said.

"We're looking at various operations that could offset the (fish) ladder temperature differences," he said. "Those discussions are going on."

Peters said that report will be presented to the Northwest Power and Conservation Council, possibly in April. The council is made up of representatives from Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana, and works to balance regional power needs with fish and wildlife.

Possible emergency measures might include closing off surface collectors at the dams when water temperatures get too high. Surface collectors take in water near the surface to help with juvenile fish passage, but can introduce warmer water into the dams' fish ladders that impede returning adults.

Another idea, Peters said, is to start catching and trucking fish at the dams earlier in the year when conditions arise. But nothing has been set in stone.

"I think we were all caught somewhat behind last year," he said.
