Proposed design of the BMX track as prepared by the North Coast Trail Alliance.

Biking tracks proposed for Cartwright Park

Track would host both young and experienced

SEASIDE — For kids and adults who say there's nothing to do in Seaside, it's time to take the mountain bikes out of the garage.

A local group of bike riders proposes to build a BMX pump track in Cartwright Park. The 100-foot by 200-foot track would consist of a small area for children and a larger area for adults and more experienced riders.

Plans for the proposed track were outlined by local residents Chris Quackenbush, Morgan Soller and Steven Blakesley, members of the newly formed North Coast Trail Association, at the Seaside City Council Monday night.

The proposal will go to the Seaside Planning Commission Tuesday.

If approved, the North Coast Trail Association would build the track on vacant land north of the park's boat ramp and behind the Seaside School District Administration Building. The oblong tracks, placed outside the riparian zone, would consist of natural soils built up into berms and hills to challenge the riders.

Materials, supplies and labor to build the tracks will be donated; at least two association members operate construction companies. Landscaping will be done by the Seaside Kiwanis. Construction could begin this spring.

Organized last July, the North Coast Trail Association consists of 24 members, many of whom are local surfers. The association's goals are to maintain area bike trails and become involved in community projects that support biking, Quackenbush said. The group "adopted" the Gnat Creek Trail, east of Astoria, through a partnership with the state Department of Forestry.

Pump tracks provide something for families to do while increasing their physical activity, said Blakesley, who is the health promotion specialist for Clatsop County. Bike riding is popular among visitors to Oregon, he added: More than 4.5 million visitors rode bikes while in the state in 2014.

Oregon's mountain bikers brought in $2.3 million revenue in 2014, Blakesley said. Overnight biking visitors spend eight times more than day travelers, he said.

Although several city councilors appeared to support the track, the council won't take formal action on the proposal until the Planning Commission considers it. Councilor Tita Montero noted that the track would be easy to reach by much of the community since it would be built in an existing city park.

Boater education class on Saturday

local boating rules and regulations, as well as tips and techniques for making boating more enjoyable. In addition, a section on cold-water survival will be shared.

U.S. Coast Guard Auxiliary Flotilla 62 and the Oregon State Marine Board will teach a boater education class this Saturday.

The class is mandatory for a boater to receive a boater education card.

The class will be held from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the second floor conference room at Englund Marine & Industrial Supply in Astoria.

Class registration starts at 7:30 a.m. The cost for the class, which includes the class manual, is $10.

The course covers practical boating safety information and ing adult (16 years of age; 18 years of age for personal watercraft operators) when operating power boats greater than 10 horsepower.

Boaters can be cited a hefty fine for not having a card. The boater education card will also save money on boat insurance.

The National Association of State Boating Law Administrators approves the course, which will be taught by qualified instructors in a classroom environment.

To pre-register for the course or obtain further information, contact Dave Phillips at (503) 440-9130.
