

'Not a Ban': Most efforts will focus on the beach

More cops, less camping

despite a statewide burn ban. Residents complained of parking issues and rowdy parties. Police said they were stretched dangerously thin, and did not receive clear directions about what rules to enforce with beach visitors.

On July 5, the dunes were scarred with burn marks and tire tracks, dumpsters and port-a-potties were overflowing, and the beach was littered with trash, environmentally harmful firecracker debris, and even human waste. Locals were left to clean up the mess.

"It was a learning curve!" Cozby said, as she recalled the town halls, and seemingly countless meetings and email exchanges that the Not a Ban volunteers engaged in as part of the effort to regain some local control over an event dominated by out-of-town visitors.

"Just learning the multiple agencies that have jurisdiction on the beach was amazing," Cozby said. "Just learning what all the moving parts were and then trying to bring them together. That was probably what we thought was going to be the hardest part, but it turned out to be one of the easiest things."

This year, consistency is key, Cozby said. Business leaders, police and volunteers will promote a unified message about what is and isn't OK.

"One of the problems on the peninsula (last year) was people giving different information. Everyone agreed; we have to all give the same message, we have to all back it up," Cozby explained. Most efforts will focus on the beach, since that's where most of the action happens, Cozby said.

Local and state police agencies will provide significantly more officers than last year. Parks, for example, plans to provide about 10 rangers, compared to about three last year, according to Cozby. Group members hope that will free up local officers to deal with problems on roads and in neighborhoods.

For the first time in a long time, there will be a serious effort to enforce the beach camping ban. To make this possible, State Parks staff had to modify the vague language in their existing policy, Cozby said.

"Parks is putting up temporary signage on approaches, reminding people not to camp. That has led to so many of the problems. People are having a good time, they're partying, they're drinking, they're carrying on," Cozby explained. If beachgoers don't cooperate with the better-publicized rules this year, she said, the rangers "will be giving citations."

The morning of July 5, looking south from Long Beach's Bolstad beach approach, was a scene of many people camped on the beach in violation of state law. This weekend, Washington State Parks and other authorities plan an active enforcement campaign to curtail camping and other illegal practices that contributed to a sense of events being out of control.

"There is a $99 civil infraction in the code for illegal fires, leaving rubbish or 'sanitation' (using dunes instead of restrooms, to put it politely) and a $150 civil infraction for camping on the beach, which is illegal," State Parks spokeswoman Virginia Painter said. All other traffic and criminal laws also are enforced on the beach.

Additionally, peninsula businesses have agreed to display more than 150 posters and banners that provide guidelines for celebrating safely and responsibly, and Sid's grocery store and Jack's Country Store will distribute fliers in customers' grocery bags over the weekend.

Cozby praised business owners for quickly agreeing to help out, and members of the Parks' communications team, who contributed significantly to the effort to create these informational materials.

No policy changes

Cozby said that when official and community leaders realized how serious locals' concerns were, they generally took real initiative to come up with solutions.

"Once it got on their radar, they went ahead and started scheduling meetings themselves and working together. That part came very simply. That was really a bonus for us," Cozby said.

However, she noted that while outreach efforts are going really well, an attempt to change local policy was not successful. In Washington, counties can impose local restrictions on fireworks sales and use. About half of all counties have created policies that are more restrictive than state law, but Pacific County has not.

Not a Ban members asked Pacific County commissioners to take preliminary steps toward changing the local ordinance, but commissioners declined to do so.

"We worked very hard to try and help our commissioners understand that this was something that needed attention," Cozby said. The commissioners' decision was disappointing to group members, because it was perhaps the most substantial thing the county could have done, and because the process moves very slowly.

"In order to have a change for 2017, the county would have had to do the steps, including town meetings, forums, workshops with the public — to have that going, and they chose not to," Cozby explained. "They want to wait and see how this year goes. So that means unless there's some huge change that happens to the state law, we can't have any (local) change until 2018." Cozby said commissioners did attend many meetings, and were "supportive" in other respects.

"We have met with them, we have written them, we have done all sorts of efforts on that. I'm not sure that we were always heard that well," Cozby said. "They wanted to see if our efforts made a change. That's what it comes down to. They want to see what happens this year. We're saying, 'We already have an idea of what potentially could happen.'"

Cozby said Not a Ban members plan to continue advocating for policy changes and additional outreach efforts over the coming year. A date has yet to be set, but the group will host a public town hall some time later in July.

"We understand that this is a long haul. It's not going to be over on the fifth," Cozby said.

VW: 'There are variations in each case'

570,000 2.0- and 3.0-liter diesel vehicles in the United States, concealing the existence of "defeat device" software installed in the vehicles. The software enabled the company to circumvent emissions standards for certain air pollutants.

VW and Porsche misrepresented the cars as environmentally friendly and compliant with federal and state emissions standards, Rosenblum said. In fact, the vehicles emitted harmful amounts of nitrogen oxides, she said.

Tuesday's settlements resolve consumer claims raised by 38 states, the federal government and car owners in private class action suits.

Rosenblum and Gov. Kate Brown made the settlement announcements Tuesday morning at the World Trade Center in Portland.

Lake Oswego attorney Tim Quenelle is waiting for the legal dust to settle before he celebrates — if you can call it that — Tuesday's announcement by Volkswagen.

"I am impressed with Volkswagen's ability to fess up and try to bring peace to the valley as quickly as they did," says Quenelle, co-counsel on more than three dozen state and federal lawsuits brought by VW owners across Oregon who purchased the affected diesel models. "They've certainly worked very hard under immense pressure to do what probably could be the fairest thing for just about everyone involved in this."

That doesn't mean all of Quenelle's clients are going to jump into the VW class-action lawsuit pool and scoop up cash and other considerations in a settlement (which still must be approved by a judge). Far from it. Quenelle and co-counsel David Sugerman of Portland are pressing ahead with their 19 state lawsuits against Volkswagen of America Inc., and their 19 federal cases (which have been lumped into the federal case pending in California).

Any acceptable class-action settlement, Quenelle says, "has to be in the middle of a bell-shaped curve." But individual cases, like those he and Sugerman represent, can push for more money in damages based on each VW owners' experiences and costs.

"There are variations in each case," he says.

Most of the individual cases represented by Quenelle and Sugerman were filed by VW owners who claimed they were enticed by Volkswagen's deceptive advertising to purchase the "clean diesel" cars. Claims vary, but most of the plaintiffs have asked the court to grant them the full value of their cars — some of which sold for more than $30,000 — and punitive damages.

There were nearly 30 individual and class-action cases pending against Volkswagen of America in Oregon's U.S. District Court. Most of them were moved in mid-June to federal court in Northern California, where more than 100 cases have been filed since the emissions-defeating software scandal broke in September 2015.

Volkswagen officials have not commented on the individual lawsuits, but expressed regret last fall about the diesel engine software deception. Martin Winterkorn, Volkswagen AG chief executive officer, issued a statement in September saying he was "deeply sorry" for the deception and the company would work to retain customers' trust.
