Visitors look at Cannabis indica marijuana plants on loan from Dark Heart Nursery as part of the "Altered State: Marijuana in California" exhibit at the Oakland Museum of California in Oakland, Calif. Set against the backdrop of a California ballot measure in 2016 to legalize marijuana's recreational use, the exhibition features artwork, political documents and posters, scientific and interactive displays meant to provoke questions and conversations about pot.

California pot exhibit aims for debate on provocative plant

OAKLAND, Calif. — It's known as Mary Jane, ganja, Chronic and even the sticky icky and has been featured in countless movies, including one that warned of its dangers, "Reefer Madness."

Now, marijuana is the subject of a contemporary history and science exhibit.

"Altered State: Marijuana in California," a one-of-its-kind museum exhibition focusing on the topic, is open through the summer at the Oakland Museum of California.

Set against the backdrop of a California ballot measure this year asking voters to legalize marijuana's recreational use, the exhibition features artwork, political documents and posters, scientific displays, and interactive and multimedia exhibits all meant to provoke questions and conversations about the provocative plant.

A confessional is set up where visitors are invited to give their views on marijuana if they knew they could remain anonymous, as part of the "Altered State: Marijuana in California" exhibit at the Oakland Museum of California in Oakland, Calif. Posted on the wall surrounding the confessional are some of the responses received.

about this topic," said Associate Curator of Natural Sciences Sarah Seiter.

"We're interested in presenting a forum for all sides of deep community conversations about marijuana, its history, politics, culture and impacts on our state," Seiter said.

The exhibit comes at a time when 35 states already have medical marijuana laws on the books and four states and Washington, D.C., have legalized weed for recreational use.

It is organized into 10 different areas of focus — Cannabis Science, Profitable Pot, Sacred Ganja, Criminal Dope, Creative Grass, Evil Weed, Politically Loaded, Youth and Weed, and Recreational Reefer. It was a two-year project with about 100 collaborators.

"Weed has a lot of fans," Seiter said. "We didn't want to open ourselves up to criticism. We wanted to do our homework."

Highlights of the exhibition include live and preserved specimens of cannabis on loan to the museum, a walk-in installation by artist Cybele Lyle that alters viewers' perspectives of space and time, and a "Cannabis Confessional" that allows visitors to share their private, anonymous thoughts about marijuana.

"All of us as individuals and as staff have very personal and emotional reactions to pot," said Lori Fogarty, the museum's director. "I think a lot of that depends on where you are in your life and your own personal experiences. What we were striving to do is move the conversation beyond those purely emotional reactions to a broader understanding."

The exhibition runs through Sept. 25.

USDA buys up more surplus cranberries

Large inventory still remains, lowering prices

The U.S. Department of Agriculture will spend $27.5 million on cranberry concentrate, buying a fraction of the surplus berries that are suppressing prices.

The purchase of the value-added product will soak up 30 million pounds, or 300,000 barrels, of cranberries, according to the industry's Cranberry Marketing Committee, which announced the purchase in a press release June 29.

"We're pleased to hear that. Certainly when you have an inventory of 7 million barrels, it's nice to have some help getting rid of that," Washington cranberry grower Malcolm McPhail said July 1.

Total U.S. production in 2015 was about 8.4 million barrels, according to the USDA National Agricultural Statistics Service.

The cranberry surplus has hovered around 90 percent in recent years, swelled partly by a bumper crop of nearly 9 million barrels in 2013. Farmers have seen prices fall every year since 2009.

The average price growers received in 2014 was $30.90 per 100-pound barrel. The USDA is due to issue a report Wednesday on the 2015 crop.

"Any sale of cranberries helps our growers," Ocean Spray cooperative spokeswoman Kellyanne Dignan said. "From our perspective, we appreciate the USDA's attention to the cranberry industry."

The USDA purchases surplus food to stabilize prices under a program created during the Depression. The government distributes the food to schools, summer camps and charities.

The USDA has been a regular customer for cranberry farmers. The purchases included buying 680,000 barrels for $55 million around Thanksgiving 2014. A bipartisan group of federal lawmakers from the five cranberry-producing states lobbied for the purchase.

"We are grateful for the continued support of the USDA and appreciate the positive impact that this bonus buy has on our industry," the marketing committee's executive director, Michelle Hogan, said in a written statement.

A Massachusetts task force in mid-June made several recommendations to help that state's cranberry growers.

The recommendations included providing grants, tax credits and low-interest loans to farmers to renovate bogs and increase yields.

Other recommendations called for programs to pay farmers to convert bogs to wetlands to reduce production.

Cranberries are the top farm crop in Massachusetts, the country's second-leading cranberry producer.

Washington, the fifth-leading cranberry state after number-three New Jersey and number-four Oregon, has 1,700 acres planted in cranberries. "I think everybody is hanging in there," McPhail said.
