'What would you like to see happen with Heritage Square?'

Mary Muniz, Astoria

"They could make a park of it. Possibly a continuation of the Chinese garden. Or fill in the hole and plant trees perhaps cottonwood, like in Alamogordo, New Mexico."

John Miller, Astoria

"I love the idea of the farmer's market there in the summer season, it pulls people into that space. And since the library is not going to be there, we need parking available so people can wander around downtown, where wonderful things are happening."

Advocates sue to stop plan to spay wild horses

By STEVEN DUBOIS Associated Press

PORTLAND — Advocates for wild horses have sought an injunction to stop researchers from surgically sterilizing more than 200 wild mares at a facility in Hines.

The U.S. Bureau of Land Management has said the research slated to begin this summer would help determine whether the three methods to be studied are safe, effective options for controlling the wild horse population.

But the nonprofit group Front Range Equine Rescue describes the procedures as unnecessary and barbaric.

Wood said in a statement that performing unproven surgeries is contrary to the Bureau of Land Management's congressional mandate to care for wild horses, especially when an existing vaccine works as effective birth control.

The Bureau of Land Management, which has said the vaccine isn't effective enough, did not have an immediate response to the lawsuit, which was filed Monday in Washington, D.C.

Of the three methods, the advocates are most concerned about a procedure that involves removing ovaries from sedated, pregnant mares in various gestational stages. The veterinarian reaches into the vagina to sever and remove the ovaries.

"BLM's intention engage in the blind excision of mares' ovaries, with the hope that they get it right, is dangerous, inhumane, potentially fatal, and arbitrary and capricious," the lawsuit states.

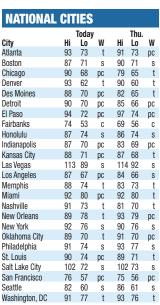

The decision to carry out the research comes on the heels of the Bureau of Land Management's est annual population estimate that shows about 67,000 wild horses and burros roaming public lands in 10 West-

Hundreds of seabirds washing up dead off Olympic Peninsula

Mary Larson

PORT TOWNSEND, Wash. - Scientists are looking into the deaths of hundreds of seabirds in the eastern part of the Strait of Juan de Fuca in Washington state.

About 300 rhinoceros auklets, which are closely related to puffins, have washed ashore since May, the Peninsula Daily News reported. Julia Parrish, executive director of the Coastal Observation and Seabird Survey Team, says there's no clear explanation.

"We've never seen anything like 300 rhinoceros auklets wash ashore in the eastern Strait," she said. "There's definitely something going on." Dead birds have been found at Discovery Bay, Dungeness Spit near Sequim and across the strait near Victoria, British Columbia. Some have been sent to the U.S. Geological Survey National Wildlife Health Center for testing.

About 72,000 of the birds are successfully breeding on Protection Island, a wildlife refuge near the mouth of Discovery Bay, Parrish said, so a lack of food doesn't seem to be the issue.

Scientists also are looking into possible contagions or poisons, but if that were the case, Parrish said she would expect more to have washed up. She also said there could be a small algae bloom adding toxins to the food supply.

The organization has hundreds of trained volunteers monitoring the beaches in the Strait and recording what they find, she said.

The British Columbia Beach Bird Survey is recording the dead birds found on the Canadian shore.
