

Oregon bottle deposit will cost you 10 cents next year

Associated Press

PORTLAND — Oregon's bottle deposit is doubling next April in an effort to boost redemption rates. Five years ago, the state Legislature decided that if the redemption rate fell below 80 percent for two consecutive years, the 5 cent bottle deposit would be doubled to a dime. The redemption rate didn't even hit 70 percent in 2014 and 2015, so the deposit will rise April 1. Oregon Liquor Control Commission spokeswoman Christie Scott told The Oregonian/OregonLive that the state will use the lag time to work with manufacturers, beverage distributors and consumers to prepare for the change. Cans and bottle labeling must be updated to reflect the 10 cent deposit and redemption centers must reprogram their machines.

Chinook season opens with new rules to protect wild fish

The Daily Astorian

Fall Chinook salmon fishing opened Monday on the Lower Columbia River tributaries under new rules designed to protect wild fish. Only fin-clipped fall Chinook may be retained this year in a move to protect wild tulle

Chinook, a species listed for protection under the Endangered Species Act. Streams covered by the temporary rule include Youngs River and Bay, Bear Creek, Beaver Creek, Big Creek, Gnat Creek, John Day River, Klaskanine River (including North and South Fork), Clatskanie River, Plympton Creek and the Lewis and Clark River. While anglers are still allowed to fish for Chinook in these streams and keep up to two adult and five jack (15-24 inches) Chinook, they must be fin-clipped fish, which are marked with a healed adipose or ventral fin clip.
