Two-rod fishing expanded to coastal streams

The Daily Astorian

Oregon's popular two-rod fishing is being extended to coastal streams open to salmon and steelhead fishing this fall to help anglers take advantage of expected strong Chinook salmon returns.

"We are expecting another strong return of fall Chinook this season, and allowing the expanded use of two rods for coastal rivers will give anglers a great opportunity to harvest these fish," Mike

Gauvin, manager of the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife's recreational fishing program, said in a statement.

The temporary rule is effective today through Oct. 31 in all coastal streams open to angling for Chinook salmon, hatchery coho and hatchery steelhead. Only a single rod can be used for any other game and nongame fish species.

Two-rod validations are nothing new. The state has been gradually opening more waterways to the use of two rods. For $21.50, licensed anglers can purchase the right to use a second rod in certain locations of the state, including most ponds and lakes, and now coastal streams.

Gauvin noted that anglers who have already purchased a 2016 Two Rod Angling Validation do not need another one for the coastal openings. Also, youth anglers under age 12 are permitted under the rules to use two rods, where allowed, without purchasing a fishing license or a two-rod validation.
