

IDs: No legislation planned to change the state law

Congress passed the Real ID Act in response to the 9/11 terrorist attacks. It requires higher standards of proof of legal U.S. residency and additional security measures that make the cards harder to replicate.

The Oregon Legislature in 2009 banned the DMV from spending state funds to comply with the federal act, which lawmakers saw as an unfunded mandate. Since then, the state has routinely and successfully sought deadline extensions.

Lawmakers briefed on the issue earlier this year showed no sign of reconsidering, and transportation officials said there was no legislation planned to change the state law.

Absent a change in law or the arrival of federal funding, state transportation officials said they would continue to seek extensions.

The Transportation Security Administration, which oversees airport security, said it intends to stop accepting non-compliant IDs on Jan. 22, 2018. States that are still compliant — including those whose deadlines have been extended — face a hard deadline in October 2020, when Homeland Security has said it will require all air travelers to carry a Real ID-compliant license.

The federal government this month rejected extension requests from Oklahoma, Kentucky, Maine, Pennsylvania and South Carolina. Three others — Minnesota, Missouri and Washington — were previously notified that they were not in compliance with federal law.

Vintage Hardware co-owners Paul Tuter and Becky Johnson pose for a portrait Saturday in their newly opened location in Astoria.

Store: First pop-up shop is collection of books

Just inside the front entrance, customers are treated to a large Union Jack covering an entire wall, different shades of gray like the rest of the interior. Behind the cash register, a yellow, conical wall painting marks the entrance to a small alcove Johnson said will be used for an alternating pop-up shop carrying different collections.

"The first shop will be a private collection" of books, she said. "We have a college professor who will come in and price them."

Part of Vintage Hardware's reputation is repurposing old building supplies into new pieces of art. The store is divided between departments, each illustrated by an artistic exhibit made from products at the store, from a covered seating area made from windows and topped by lights embedded in box springs, to a wall hanging of chairs. Johnson said she likes to show people what they can create with the products at the store.

Johnson said she and Tuter haven't even touched their storage warehouse in the old location. But the store has until the end of the month, she said, before the sale with Mo's Restaurant will likely be completed. "We're going to have a big inventory sale at the end of the month," she said.

Tennis: 'I'm totally in love with bees'

2008, her father gave her a box of bees to start her own colony.

Eight years later, she said, "I'm totally in love with bees."

A year-round commitment

To find success as a beekeeper, keepers must be willing to work hard and be consistent. Above all, though, "Beekeepers pay attention," Tennis said, adding, "The most important aspect of being a beekeeper is being able to observe and retain what you're observing, or to analyze and understand it."

If a person does not regularly interact with bees, they likely will struggle to understand the bees' behavior, moods and vocabulary. Beekeepers have to observe and learn quickly to avoid being stung and to keep their colonies healthy and thriving, Tennis said. For instance, bees communicate through pheromones, and the aroma they emanate when upset smells like banana candy.

"You're always going to be learning something," Tennis said.

The work of a beekeeper is spread throughout the year.

In the wintertime, bees are in a quiet state because the weather is usually too cold and wet for them to fly and there is little food to forage. That's when beekeepers work on equipment, assembling new parts or changing out old frames with wax that has built up an unhealthy amount of toxins or residue.

In March or April each year, Tennis usually prepares her honey-gathering equipment, which includes honey supers — smaller boxes where bees will make honey that get placed on top of brood boxes and can later be removed to retrieve the honey — and queen excluders — a flat rack with holes large enough to allow smaller worker bees to enter but not large enough for the queen bee to get through, which prevents her from laying in that section.

In the spring, once Tennis knows baby bees are being laid and male bees are around, she inspects her hives to see if each one has a queen and if she's laying well. If a hive is strong, she then splits the colony, putting all the frames with baby bees in one box and the others back into the original box. The procedure has three benefits: breaking the reproductive cycles of varroa mites without using pesticides; helping to build apiaries; and controlling or preventing swarming.

During the summer, the bees forage and make honey. Tennis works as a bee-wrangler of sorts, responding to people's calls for help and catching rampaging swarms of bees. While some are nervous around swarming bees, catching them is Tennis' favorite task. She has found swarms in some strange places, including chimneys, utility boxes, the walls of sheds and inside a gas tank.

The next phase of beekeeping is harvesting honey during the fall. Plant nectar originally is about 80 percent moisture; after the bees process it, the moisture is reduced to 18 percent or less, making it a highly saturated and hygroscopic fluid. Tennis uses a centrifuge to get the honey from the wax combs on her frames. Depending on where and what plants the nectar originated, honey can have a variety of colors and flavors.

Those who don't want to keep bees can contribute to the health of pollinators by taking other steps, such as letting their lawn grow, planting flowers that bloom in late fall or early spring and limiting their use of pesticides and other toxic chemicals, Tennis said. They also can support their community beekeepers.
