TOMORROW'S NATIONAL WEATHER

Clatskanie's mayor concedes to local write-in candidate

By LAUREN KRONEBUSCH
 The Daily News

Clatskanie Mayor Diane Pohl had no challenger on Tuesday's election ballot, but Wednesday she conceded to write-in candidate Bob Brajcich before the final vote was even tallied.

On Tuesday, Pohl received 214 votes, less than half the number of write-in votes in the race, 481. Election and city officials still have not determined how many of those write-ins were cast for Brajcich, a retired mechanic.

Pohl, who has dealt with recent scandals in both public and private life, said she conceded out of respect for the will of the people. Her term expires at the end of December.

"I believe in our country. I believe in our system. I believe in the people voting for who they believe is the best candidate. That's our American way," she said Wednesday.

It's been a tough few years for Pohl, who survived a recall petition last year. Critics launched the recall after she accepted the resignation of former Police Chief Marvin Hoover before the state's investigation into his alleged misconduct had finished. Hoover left last year over complaints by two of his officers that he made racist remarks.

Pohl's husband, former city planning commissioner Ray Pohl, was arrested in September 2015 on allegations that he exposed his genitals at a female drive-thru coffee stand worker over the course of 2 1/2 years. He was given three years of probation, ordered to complete a sex offender treatment program and pay $11,100 to the woman.

And though the city government and mayor had nothing to do with it, the community also witnessed a high school principal ousted in a "sextortion" scandal and a $1.3 million settlement from the PUD in a sexual harassment case.

"I think people got wary of the constant attention to that, whether it was bogus or it was real," she said of her husband's arrest and the controversy over Hoover's resignation.

"I think people kind of got tired of it. I've been mayor 10 years. A lot of times, as a public servant you need to be aware that there's a life cycle in serving. It's good to have that turnover."

Pohl said it's been an honor to serve the community. In 2006, she ran on an anti-drugs platform after her friend, retired Clatsop County Sheriff Al Eastman, died in 2004 after a gunfight with a man running from police. She said she also is proud of starting an emergency response team, starting a canine drug program and moving City Hall into its new home.

It won't be certain who won the election until City Council ratifies the votes at its meeting Dec. 7. Clatskanie Elections Clerk Don Clack said staff have yet to validate the write-in votes. So far, they only know the number of write-in votes.

Brajcich, a 63-year-old retired mechanic, said he ran against Pohl because he didn't want to see her unopposed.

"I think it's sad when you have offices unopposed. It looks like no one cares," he said, adding that he wants to give back to his community.

This is his second attempt running against Pohl. He also ran two years ago.
