

Seaside High puts the 'oomph' in the yearbook

By KATHERINE LACAZE

When it comes to capturing significant events and activities throughout the school year and preserving them through quotes and photographs, the staff of Seaside High School's Seabreeze yearbook is poised for the task.

The remaining staff is comprised of about 20 other students, who may take yearbook one to three terms depending on their other activities or classes.

"You have to kind of keep the class even between experienced people and new people, just so we don't have such a huge learning curve," said Amy Rider, the teacher adviser who took over the program from Susan Baertlein this year.

The two teachers co-taught during first term; Rider will be solo for the remaining two terms. The transition will give Baertlein time to oversee the fall play next school year, among other things.

"As teachers here you have to take on coaching clubs, basically whatever is out there to be done," Rider explained. "(Baertlein) needed to clear her plate so she could take on some other things, and I got tapped."

Although the job fell into her lap, she added, "it is a really positive thing." She majored in English in college and has long harbored an interest in yearbook and magazine editing. At larger school districts, such as the one she previously taught in, the yearbook program can run under the same person for years.

"Here, something comes up and you jump in with both feet and you learn as you go," Rider said. "I'm totally happy to do it."

Students from Seaside High School's yearbook class attend a field trip to Fultano's during the fall term. The class has about 15 students on average each term, a combination of newcomers and returning staff members.

The publication process

The class meets five days per week. Responsibilities are divided so roughly half the class is in the computer lab working on layouts while the other half interviews people and takes photographs.

"If a kid is interested in something, obviously they're going to put a little more curriculum, Rider said.

One of the first assignments, which involves all students, is selling advertisements. During "ad day," the students are split into groups, with some students going around Seaside and others around Cannon Beach and Gearhart to solicit businesses to take out advertisements, Rider said. Sales and advertisements cover the majority of costs for the program.

If a business purchases a quarter-page or larger ad, then they receive a complimentary yearbook. Some keep them to display at their office. Others choose to donate them to a student who is unable to purchase one.

"We try to make sure all the kids get them," Rider said.

Work that stands out

In the past, Rider said, schools would use "sort of a boilerplate format" from year to year, and crank out an almost identical yearbook, just with different photos.

Seaside is trying something new with its layout this year. While the yearbook will feature the traditional sections, it will be designed with a "modern layout, more like what you would see in a magazine," Rider said.

The goal is to produce a clean, fashionable layout, Baertlein said, adding, "We're trying to declutter, or tidying up our pages."

Rider said she is impressed by the students' design abilities. For instance, Been personally crafted the font being used on the front cover this year.

Their skills have been recognized the past two years at Yearbooks Northwest, a summer camp attended by students from Oregon and Washington. At the camp, students must come up with a design and yearbook cover by the end. The projects are displayed and judged by media professionals. During this past summer, Seaside won Outstanding Concept and Design Package.

"It really stood out this year," Rider said of the Seaside students' submitted work.
