

Freezing temps will keep Portland icy for days

Associated Press

PORTLAND — Schools were closed and more than 5,000 Portland General Electric customers remained without power Thursday as the Portland area recovers from one of the biggest snowstorms in its history.

Almost a foot of snow fell in downtown Portland on Tuesday and Wednesday, putting it in the conversation with similar storms from 1980 and 1995.

The sun came out Thursday morning, but the National Weather Service expects freezing temperatures will prevent much melting over the next few days. Roads are either unplowed or slippery, and sidewalks are icy and treacherous.

Oregon Gov. Kate Brown and Portland Mayor Ted Wheeler declared states of emergency Wednesday due to the severe winter storm conditions.

Early morning traffic is at a standstill along Interstate 5 headed into Portland on Wednesday. A major snowstorm spread through Portland and parts of Washington state overnight, toppling trees, closing schools and cutting power to thousands.

The state declaration allows the deployment of the Oregon State Police and the Oregon National Guard to assist communities and frees up aid for recovery efforts related to the storms. The Portland Bureau of Transportation ran plows through the night. KATU-TV reported that eight plow and salt trucks from Seattle arrived around 5 a.m. Thursday to assist.

TriMet, the Portland-based regional mass transit agency, said buses and light-rail trains were running normal weekday schedules but warned people to avoid unnecessary travel.

After a day filled with delays and cancellations, Portland International Airport was experiencing fewer problems Thursday.

Portland General Electric said power outages affecting more than 63,000 customers have been repaired, but the heavy snow continues to bring down trees and branches.

Meanwhile, central Oregon is dealing with its own historic snowfall.

The Bulletin newspaper of Bend reports that the National Weather Service in Pendleton recorded 24 inches of snowpack Wednesday at its official reporting location at the Bend Public Works Department near Pilot Butte. That amount broke the Jan. 11 snow-depth record, which was 16 inches on Jan. 11, 1993.

The weight from 2 feet of snow was putting a strain on roofs. Bend firefighters responded a collapsed building Wednesday evening near the Old Mill District.

Debris from the collapse was found 100 yards away, according to a fire department news release.

Earlier Wednesday, heavy snow threatened to collapse a FedEx distribution center in Bend, prompting the closure of the building, with undelivered packages still inside.

A Bend Fire Department tweet said the building "could literally collapse at any time."

The Bulletin reports the building is still standing, but its north wall is bowed and an engineer concluded the structure is unsound.
