

Housing: 'You are ... changing the complexion of the neighborhood'

Review criteria

Price argued that, for ADUs in residential zones of higher density, a Type 2 review that requires administrative review and giving neighbors notice and a chance to comment makes sense.

New structures could have a lifespan of many decades, and people who will have to live near them are entitled, she said, to give their input, even if it delays approval by several weeks, she said.

Before the vote, Price floated a motion to require Type 2 review in medium- and high-density residential zones. It died 3-2, with Councilor Tom Brownson siding with Price.

Brownson felt Type 2 review is entirely appropriate; with ADUs come more people, vehicles and structures: "You are actually changing the complexion of the neighborhood," he said. Residents, he said, should be able to respond to these changes.

City Councilor Zetty Nemlowill expressed sympathy for this view, but felt the council's plan to re-examine the ordinance in a year was sufficient.

"We need to move forward on this," she said. "We need to stop being bogged down in the minutia and create some housing for Astorians."

Mayor Arline LaMear and City Councilor Bruce Jones, noting that Type 2 review is not currently required for standard remodels in medium and high-density zones, said it would be inconsistent to require this level of review simply because ADUs happen to be involved.

Astoria hopes to expand accessory dwelling units to increase opportunities for long-term rental housing.

Not the 'lowest-hanging fruit'

Doug Thompson, a former city councilor and current board member of the Lower Columbia Preservation Society, said the organization — whose goal is to protect the historic character of Astoria's neighborhoods — supports the ordinance in concept.

But he also believes that property owners should be given public notice and an opportunity to appeal the proposed ADUs to the Planning Commission.

Chris Ferrar, of Astoria, spoke against the ordinance, arguing the city should work to increase housing stock by encouraging developers to buy abandoned buildings and turn them into housing complexes.

Planning Commissioner Sean Fitzpatrick, who spoke impartially on the ordinance, said that converting run-down structures into housing has helped alleviate the crisis in recent months.

After the meeting, Thompson said that beginning to solve Astoria's housing shortage with ADUs, in hindsight, may not have been "the lowest-hanging fruit."

The final reading, scheduled later this month, will also include amendments that further clarify rules regarding owner occupancy and the homestay lodging prohibition.

ODOT: Work group of lawmakers plans to recommend accountability measures legislative standards with the realities of the agency's operations and an audit by the Secretary of State's Office specifically on ODOT's management of funds in the highway program.

Finally, the Department of Administrative Services recommends conducting another management review in 2020 to identify the progress of any changes.

"I fully embrace these recommendations and wholeheartedly believe that ODOT will be a stronger organization as a result of them," said ODOT Director Matt Garrett in an email to staff. "Moreover, I commit to working with the (Oregon Transportation) Commission, ODOT employees and our customers to implement these recommendations in a transparent and accountable manner."

Agency leadership will assemble a steering team to help guide implementation of the recommendations and track and report on progress, which also will be published on a webpage, said Assistant ODOT Director Travis Brouwer. The agency also plans to develop a strategic business plan, Garrett wrote in his email to employees.

Gov. Kate Brown ordered the management review to help allay some lawmakers' concerns in preparation for consideration of a transportation package worth hundreds of millions of dollars this session. The revenue to pay for projects would likely come largely from a hike in the state's gas tax and registration fees.

The state paid McKinsey $1 million to conduct the management review on a short timeline, so findings would be available before the end of the legislative session. Yet deadlines for finishing work products in the improvement plan are after lawmakers would likely vote on a transportation package.

A work group of lawmakers plans to recommend accountability measures for ODOT later this week. Those accountability measures could be added to the transportation package legislation.

'I fully embrace these recommendations.'

OSAA: Committee to meet five more times before final recommendation

Wary of changes

Many were caught off-guard by the committee's stance and are wary of potential changes.

"A lot of people think that if it isn't broke, don't fix it," said Craig Rothenberger, athletic director at Class 4A Junction City. "I don't know what drove them. After the last open session, I walked out of there thinking, 'Boy, there's a lot of support for six classifications.'"

According to Rub, the committee's latest five-classification proposal could create more problems than it fixes. He said it increases the disparity in school size within classifications and would make it difficult for some schools to compete.

Warrenton, with an enrollment of 228, would be in a Class 3A league with schools such as Tillamook (533) and Astoria (511).

Newport, with an enrollment of 550, would be in a Class 4A league with schools such as South Albany (1,158), Corvallis (1,117) and Lebanon (1,052).

"Those schools won't be able to sustain football in five years," Rub said. "There aren't a lot of things a school of 550 has in common with a school of 1,100. As soon as you keep increasing the number, and then doubling it, the more it's magnified."

"It won't necessarily make it better for everybody. I think the number of championships across the board in Class 4A and 5A by so many different schools does show some indication that what was created has worked, in terms of creating better balance."

Rothenberger said that no plan will make everybody happy, but "the beauty of six classes is that most people came away pretty happy."

Everybody had a chance. This puts us back where there will be some schools that their chances are markedly diminished."

The committee could address football separately. One of the early proposals in the process was a football-only, six-classification alignment composed of special districts, an idea that has more relevance now with the committee leaning toward five classifications.

"Now I can imagine there are some people that are going to want to revisit that, if we are going to five classes," Rub said. "I'm not a big fan of special districts for our sports in general. I think the more that can be minimized, the better. It's not the same as when your program is part of a league."

The committee's next meeting is Monday. It is scheduled to meet five more times before giving its final recommendation to the OSAA executive board in September.
