

Lighter, brighter Imagine Dragons emerges after dark times

By MARK KENNEDY

NEW YORK — A weird thing happened when the four members of the alt-rock band Imagine Dragons sat down to listen to their new album all the way through. They actually liked it.

"This was the first record that I think, after we created it and we listened to it, we all went, for the first time, 'Yes. This is Imagine Dragons and we're proud of this,'" said lead singer Dan Reynolds. "That doesn't happen very often in this band, to be honest with you."

The Las Vegas-based quartet, which likes to blend rock and hip-hop, has always been its toughest critic, but on "Evolve," band members had to learn to let go. They relied on producers for the first time — Swedish duo Mattman & Robin, who won a Grammy for Taylor Swift's "1989," and Joel Little, who produced Lorde's

"Pure Heroine" — to shepherd the album all the way through.

"We knew as a band one of our biggest flaws was overproducing ourselves. We've known it since the beginning, and we've had so many conversations as a band saying, 'How do we peel back?' And we just couldn't do it until finally somebody walked into the room and slapped our head," Reynolds said.

The new approach reflects a lot of changes behind the scenes at Imagine Dragons, now re-entering the spotlight after more than a year away as a happier — maybe even sunnier — band. The first single, "Believer," is already a hit.

The group ground away in obscurity for years — even for sharing a bill with mimes — until being signed by producer Alex da Kid and seeing massive success with the 2012 release of the hit "Radioactive." Their second album, "Smoke + Mirrors," sold more than 1 million copies but didn't reach the sales height of their debut, "Night Visions." They spent seven years touring, a grueling schedule that took its toll.

"I think it kind of snuck up on us a little bit, to be honest. The change happened pretty fast. We were this tiny little band that struggled and struggled for so long and played any show we could — I mean, we opened for mimes, for heaven's sake. And that was by far not our worst gig," guitarist Wayne Sermon said.

By the time they blew up — with a Grammy Award and arena tours — band members feared the success would stop if they stopped. "It was sort of unhealthy for us, so this year-break was amazing," Sermon said. "I think it reflects in the music. I think the music is brighter. I think it's cleaner. I think more vibrant."

The break was most appreciated by Reynolds, who has always been frank about his battles with depression. He was desperate to get home and reconnect with his 4-year-old daughter, his wife and friends.

"I was in a really just scattered, depressed headspace, and I think it just came from a sense of losing my sense of self almost to a degree and all the abrupt changes. I had dealt with depression when I was young, but it really took on a whole new level and it was kind of a full year," he said.
