Trump son-in-law Kushner heads to Congress in Russia probe

WASHINGTON — Congressional investigators probing Russia's meddling in the U.S. election will have their first opportunity this week to hear from someone in President Donald Trump's innermost circle: son-in-law Jared Kushner.

Kushner, who is a senior adviser to the president and is married to Trump's daughter, Ivanka, will talk to staff on the Senate Intelligence Committee today behind closed doors. On Tuesday, he'll talk privately to members of the House Intelligence Committee.

Both panels are investigating Russian interference and possible connections to Trump's campaign. Kushner has attracted attention for a December meeting with a leading Russian diplomat. He oversaw digital strategy for the campaign, and some lawmakers have said they want more answers about whether Russian social media "trolls" were connected to Trump's election efforts.

Kushner also attended a June 2016 meeting with Trump's son, Donald Trump Jr., and his former campaign manager, Paul Manafort, and a Russian lawyer who Trump Jr. was told had damaging information about election rival Hillary Clinton. Congressional investigators have said they are interested in learning more about the meeting and want to talk to those who attended.

Abbe Lowell, a lawyer for Kushner, said ahead of the meetings that Kushner "has been and is prepared to voluntarily cooperate and provide whatever information he has on the investigations" to Congress.

Driver charged in smuggling deaths of 10 immigrants

SAN ANTONIO — The driver of a broiling tractor-trailer found packed with immigrants outside a Walmart in San Antonio was charged today in the deaths of 10 of his passengers and could face the death penalty.

James Matthew Bradley Jr., 60, of Clearwater, Florida, awaited an appearance in federal court later in the day to face charges of illegally transporting immigrants for financial gain, resulting in death.

Authorities discovered eight bodies inside the crowded 18-wheeler parked in the summer heat, and two more victims died at the hospital. Officials feared the death toll could rise because nearly 20 others rescued from the truck were in dire condition, many suffering from extreme dehydration and heatstroke.

A passenger told authorities that they took turns breathing through a hole in the trailer and pounding on the walls to try to get the driver's attention, according to court papers.

"We're looking at a human-trafficking crime," San Antonio Police Chief William McManus said Sunday, calling it "a horrific tragedy."

Seattle suburb may decide repeal of 'sanctuary city' status

BURIEN, Wash. — Voters in the Seattle suburb of Burien may decide this fall whether to repeal the city's so-called "sanctuary city" ordinance aimed at protecting immigrants.

King County elections officials on Friday verified an initiative petition that would repeal an ordinance passed in January directing Burien employees and law enforcement not to ask about a person's immigration status or religious affiliation.

The Burien City Council must now pass the proposed initiative or send the measure to voters on Nov. 7.

Burien city spokeswoman Emily Inlow-Hood says the council will likely meet within a week to discuss the two options.

In January, the council on a 4-3 vote passed the ordinance aimed at fostering trust and cooperation between immigrant communities and city and police officials.

But petition backers say such sanctuary city ordinances chill the sharing of information with federal immigration officials and threaten public safety.

South Africa moves ahead on domestic trade in rhino horn

JOHANNESBURG — South Africa said today it is moving ahead with draft regulations for a domestic trade in rhino horn, despite critics' concerns that a legal market will spur rhino poaching.

Anyone possessing a rhino horn will need a permit under national rules that are being prepared, and South Africa continues to recognize a ban on the international trade in horn that was imposed in 1977, said Edna Molewa, the environmental affairs minister.

Earlier this year, South Africa's Constitutional Court rejected a government appeal to preserve a 2009 ban on the domestic trade in the horns of rhinos, which have been poached in record numbers in the past decade. A rhino breeder in South Africa, which is home to most of the world's rhinos, plans an online auction of horn next month.

Rhinos graze in the bush on the edge of Kruger National Park in South Africa. South Africa's government said today it is moving ahead with draft regulations for a domestic trade in rhino horn, despite critics' concerns that a legal market will spur rhino poaching.

Rhino breeders say a regulated trade would undercut poaching. Some international conservation groups disagree, saying it would only encourage traffickers to kill rhinos and try to sell their horns on the legal market.

Under the regulations, rhino horns can be exported from South Africa for "non-commercial purposes, such as personal use, hunting trophies, research or education and training," Molewa said.

Horns that are exported must be subject to DNA tests and contain a microchip and serial number, according to the minister. Information about the owner of an exported horn, as well as the horn itself, must be logged in a national database, and a permit from a U.N. wildlife group, the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora, also will be required.

Molewa also said 529 rhinos were killed for their horns in South Africa in the first half of this year, a drop of 13 over the same period in 2016. South Africa has nearly 20,000 rhinos, according to some estimates.

UK parents halt court battle over their sick baby Charlie

LONDON — The parents of critically ill baby Charlie Gard wept as they dropped their legal bid today to send him to the United States for an experimental medical treatment, acknowledging that the window of opportunity to help him had closed.

Charlie's mother, Connie Yates, hugged her husband Chris Gard as they described their decision to "let our son go." Recent medical tests on 11-month-old Charlie showed the baby has irreversible muscular damage, and the new treatment wouldn't help.

"Mummy and Daddy love you so much, Charlie. We always have and we always will. And we are so sorry that we couldn't save you," Yates said as she wept during the hearing. "We had the chance but we weren't allowed to give you that chance."

Chris Gard said too much time was spent in court battles, wasting the chance to help Charlie. Both parents paid tribute to their "warrior son."

"We will let our son go, and be with the angels," Yates said.

Charlie has a rare genetic condition, and his parents wanted him to receive an experimental treatment in the U.S.

Doctors at Great Ormond Street Hospital in London had argued that the treatment wouldn't help and could cause the child pain, so they challenged the parent's wishes. The hospital wanted to switch off his life support and allow Charlie to die peacefully.

The case won international attention after Charlie's parents received support from Pope Francis, U.S. President Donald Trump and some U.S. lawmakers. Some U.S.-based activists also traveled to London to support Charlie's parents.

Spanish islands approve booze-free, bloodless bullfights

MADRID — Lawmakers in Spain's Balearic Islands have banned spectators under age 18, alcohol and the killing or harming of animals at regional bullfights.

A majority of left-wing deputies in the regional parliament passed a "Balearic-style bullfighting" bill today. The law also requires anti-doping tests for both matadors and bulls and limits the time each bull spends in the ring to 10 minutes.

Conservative deputies who opposed the law said promoters will find it virtually impossible to hold bullfights under the new restrictions.

Opponents also say the bill could be at odds with the protection the Spanish Constitution grants to bullfighting as national heritage.

Humane Society International, an animal rights organization, hailed Monday's move by the islands' parliament as "a very satisfying victory for compassionate policymaking."

Israel Embassy shooting in Jordan complicates shrine crisis

JERUSALEM — A deadly shooting at Israel's Embassy in Jordan further complicated Israeli government efforts today to find a way out of an escalating crisis over Jerusalem's most contested holy site, including mass Muslim prayer protests and Israeli-Palestinian violence.

The shooting, in which an Israeli security guard killed two Jordanians after being attacked by one of them with a screwdriver, has led to a diplomatic standoff between the two countries at a time when Jordan is heavily involved in efforts to defuse the crisis over the Jerusalem holy site. Jordan is the Muslim custodian of the shrine, which is also holy to Jews.

Jordanian officials said today that the guard could only leave if he first submitted to questioning, according to a news site linked to Jordan's military. Israel insisted the guard has diplomatic immunity.

The drama played out as President Donald Trump's Mideast envoy, Jason Greenblatt, headed to the Holy Land today. It was the first sign of a high-level, on-the-ground attempt by the Trump administration to end the standoff between Israel and the Muslim world.

The escalation began earlier this month when Arab gunmen fired from the holy site, killing two Israeli policemen. In response, Israel installed metal detectors at the site, a move that incensed the Muslim world.

Taliban suicide car bombing in Kabul kills 24 people

KABUL, Afghanistan — A suicide bomber rammed his car packed with explosives into a bus carrying government employees in the Afghan capital early today, killing 24 people and wounding 42 others, Kabul's police chief spokesman said. The Taliban claimed responsibility for the assault.

The attack took place in a western Kabul neighborhood where several prominent politicians reside and at rush hour, as residents were heading to work and students were on their way to a nearby private high school, said Basir Mujahed, the spokesman.

"The bomber attacked at one of the busiest times of the day," the spokesman said. "There were traffic jams with people going to work and to the university and schools. Many of the shops had just opened."

The bus was completely destroyed, along with three other cars and several shops in the area, he said, adding children were among the wounded.

In a statement the Interior Ministry called the attack "a criminal act against humanity."

Brazilians funneled as 'slaves' by US church, ex-members say

SPINDALE, N.C. — When Andre Oliveira answered the call to leave his Word of Faith Fellowship congregation in Brazil to move to the mother church in North Carolina at the age of 18, his passport and money were confiscated by church leaders — for safekeeping, he said he was told.

Trapped in a foreign land, he said he was forced to work 15 hours a day, usually for no pay, first cleaning warehouses for the secretive evangelical church and later toiling at businesses owned by senior ministers. Any deviation from the rules risked the wrath of church leaders, he said, ranging from beatings to shaming from the pulpit.

"They trafficked us up here. They knew what they were doing. They needed labor and we were cheap labor — hell, free labor," Oliveira said.

An Associated Press investigation has found that Word of Faith Fellowship used its two church branches in Latin America's largest nation to siphon a steady flow of young laborers who came on tourist and student visas to its 35-acre compound in rural Spindale.

Under U.S. law, visitors on tourist visas are prohibited from performing work for which people normally would be compensated. Those on student visas are allowed some work, under circumstances that were not met at Word of Faith Fellowship, the AP found.
