Thumbs down for Leadbetter rule changes

By AMY NILE EO Media Group

OCEAN PARK, Wash. — Pacific County has put the kibosh on proposed changes to its rules for protected rural lands made by the millionaire who built the lofty faux-lighthouse near Leadbetter Point State Park.

Craig Tillotson wanted the county Planning Commission to approve a zoning amendment that would have allowed him to live at the top of his 140-foot-tall lighthouse and offer luxury retreats at his Leadbetter Farms property. His attorney, Alan Wallace, said the 64-year-old magnate hopes to make the hundreds of acres he owns on the north end of the peninsula more profitable for his heirs.

Wallace, a Seattle-based lawyer, said Tillotson wants to change the rules so he can put rooms on the top floors of his eight-story lighthouse and use his property for high-end corporate and family retreats.

The wealthy entrepreneur does not plan to open the metal gates at oceanfront Leadbetter Farms for the general public, just for exclusive, upscale gatherings.

Leadbetter Farms proposed an amendment to county zoning regulations that would have allowed small tourism or recreation businesses on rural lands that have been protected from development.

The rule rewrite included provisions for permitting buildings up to 150-foot-tall and allowing people to stay in them.

After the first public hearing on the possible change in June, the part of the proposal that would have allowed people to stay in buildings above the county's occupancy cap of 35 feet was changed. Tillotson's lighthouse is the only building that would have been affected by the revision that would have permitted converting buildings that were built before 2017 into living spaces, county Planning and Community Development Director Tim Crose said.

The request was withdrawn after dozens of people showed up to oppose changing the rules to pave the way for more towers to suit Tillotson at the second public hearing last week.

The Planning Commission voted 4-2 against approving the new rules for rural-land use they'd been considering for almost a year.
