Nehalem Watershed Council kicks off speaker series

MANZANITA — Thirty million years ago, the present-day coastline was being formed by flood lavas from Idaho diving beneath the sea and then slowly rising out of the water to become the peaks we cherish today.

Let’s explore the origins of Onion and Angora peaks and Neahkahnie Mountain, discover the abundance of unique life within, and be inspired by the history of heroes who have worked to keep the Coastal Edge wild.

Lower Nehalem Watershed Council begins its 2017-18 Speaker Series on Thursday, Oct. 12, by welcoming Katie Voelke, executive director of the North Coast Land Conservancy.

Voelke’s presentation will explore the conservancy’s Coastal Edge Initiative and the ongoing efforts to conserve the wild and rare in our own backyards. The Coastal Edge Initiative seeks to preserve complete, contiguous coastal watersheds, allowing the once and future temperate rainforest indigenous to this coastline to thrive again. It will create a corridor of ecological connectivity of unprecedented scale in Oregon, stretching from the ridgetops to the ocean, in one of the world’s most biodiverse regions.
