Company behind farmed fish escape to move more salmon

By PHUONG LE
Associated Press

SEATTLE — The company whose collapsed net pens released thousands of farmed Atlantic salmon into Puget Sound is planning to stock another marine facility off Bainbridge Island with a million juvenile fish despite a request from the governor not to do so.

Gov. Jay Inslee had asked Cooke Aquaculture not to move fish from its hatchery to other saltwater net pens until the investigation into the Aug. 19 salmon farm collapse at its Cypress Island facility was completed.

Tens of thousands of the non-native fish escaped into Puget Sound after those net pens failed, raising concerns about its impact on native salmon. Meanwhile, three state agencies are investigating what went wrong.

That review is expected to be done in December.

"This is disappointing and frustrating, coming on the heels of the August collapse of Cooke's net pen near Cypress Island that held 305,000 fish," Inslee said in a statement Tuesday.

Inslee's chief of staff, David Postman, urged Cooke on Monday to halt the transfer of the million juvenile fish, noting that "the governor believes we do not yet have enough information about the safety of the existing pens."

"To be fair to Washington tribes, to protect our environment and to take a stand to show Washingtonians that Cooke Aquaculture is taking seriously questions about safety of net pens, I want to urge you to halt the transfer of those fish," Postman wrote to the company's lawyer.

A lawyer for the Canada-based company responded that Cooke needed to get the young salmon into saltwater pens soon — or they may have to be destroyed — and noted that it has been working with state agencies to ensure that the fish are free of disease and the pens at the Clam Bay facility are secure.

Cooke said the Clam Bay net pens are entirely different from the Cypress Island pens and recent inspections confirm they do not pose a risk of the Cypress Island incident occurring.

Cooke spokeswoman Nell Halse said in an email Tuesday that transporting fish into grow-out pens typically only requires assurances that the young fish are healthy. But given the problems at the Cypress Island facility, the company has worked with state officials to inspect the Clam Bay facility.

New operations supervisor post at Astoria 911 Dispatch

By JACK HEFFERNAN
The Daily Astorian

Astoria 911 Dispatch has promoted from within for its new operations supervisor position.

Candace Pozdolski is a lead dispatcher who has worked in Astoria for three years. Her 11 years of experience includes stops with the San Luis Obispo Sheriff's Office, Atascadero Police Department, Morro Bay Police and the Oregon Department of Forestry.

Functions of the position include assisting in the planning, training and supervision of the daily operations of the center. She also will help with the purchase and maintenance of technology. Pozdolski will continue to report to Emergency Communications Manager Jeff Rusiecki.

Pozdolski helped to implement texting as a means for reporting emergencies to the center. She also serves on the Department of Public Safety Standards and Training Telecommunications Policy Committee, which offers guidance on policies and training and reviews disciplinary reports.

Soon after Brad Johnson's sudden retirement as police chief in early August, an independent assessment found that Rusiecki — in an attempt to correct communication issues between staff and management — had for months been asking the former chief to re-ate the operations supervisor position.

Rusiecki has said communication with dispatchers would benefit if he could have time to perform external duties such as managing direction of cellular traffic and coordinating with the public safety agencies that utilize the center, rather than completely overseeing day-to-day operations.

Confederate monuments near Vancouver to lose historic status

Associated Press

VANCOUVER, Wash. — County officials in Vancouver have voted to remove highway markers honoring Confederate President Jefferson Davis from the Clark County Heritage Register.

The Columbian reported the Clark County Historic Preservation Commission voted on the delisting Tuesday night.

The commissioners said the marker, which was installed in Vancouver in 1939, failed meet established standards for a community heritage site.

Commissioner Alex Gall said the marker also lost its historic integrity when it was moved from its original spot to its current home on private property along Interstate 5 near Ridgefield.

The marker and a similar piece of granite originally installed in Blaine, near the Canadian border, now are part of Jefferson Davis Park which also includes Confederate flags.

The voting followed almost 90 minutes of public testimony, with comments in support and against the heritage register designation.

Washington state now in REAL ID 'grace period'

By RACHEL LA CORTE
Associated Press

OLYMPIA, Wash. — The more than two dozen states and U.S. territories that currently have a temporary extension from the enforcement of federal requirements for state driver's licenses and ID cards are now under a grace period through Jan. 22 as the federal government continues its review of states' progress, Washington state officials said Tuesday.

Washington was among the states that initially had a REAL ID extension through Oct. 10.

Washington state already offers, but does not mandate, enhanced driver's licenses and IDs that require proof of U.S. citizenship and are valid under the federal law.

• At 11:17 p.m. Tuesday, a 17-year-old Astoria resident was arrested by the Astoria Police Department on state Highway 202 near Smith Point and charged with DUII. The minor's blood alcohol content was 0.13 percent.

Assault
 • At 8:50 p.m. Monday,

Cabel Brent Bestal, 26, of Astoria, was arrested by the Astoria Police Department on the 4500 block of Commercial Street and charged with fourth-degree assault. He allegedly started a fight with his sister's boyfriend and hit him in the face with an open hand, causing minor injuries.

CORRECTION

Sample size incorrect — A poll by Nashville-based citizen on the Oregon governor's election in 2018 surveyed 168 Republicans. A story on 3A Tuesday incorrectly said 341 Republicans were surveyed, leading to unfounded analysis that the poll oversampled Republicans.
