Coast Guard tows in fishing boat

The Daily Astorian

ILWACO, Wash. — The Coast Guard towed in a 58-foot fishing vessel carrying four people and 42,000 pounds of fish Sunday after the crew lost use of the main engine about 17 miles west of Willapa Bay.

A boat crew aboard the Triumph II, a 52-foot motor lifeboat from Station Cape Disappointment, met the crew of the 58-foot dragger Ashlyne and towed them across the Columbia River Bar into Astoria.

Towing the Ashlyne was estimated 70- to 80-mile round-trip, towing 110 tons on the way in.

"That would make it close to the max towing capacity of the 47-MLBs, which is 150 tons," said Chief Petty Officer Bradd Beckett, executive officer, Station Cape Disappointment. "Being that close to the towing capacity made fuel consumption a concern."

The large volume of water that moves out on an ebb tide across deeper bars such as the Columbia and the struggle to operate a 47-footer in that environment was also of concern. That same environment, however, has little effect on the operation of the 52-footer due to the nature of construction.

"Coming back, we would of had to wait for the ebb to pass if we used the 47-MLB," Beckett said. "Using the 52-MLB eliminated all those concerns."

Judge, a favorite otter at the Oregon Coast Aquarium, dies

Associated Press

NEWPORT — Judge, a crowd-pleasing otter who played hide-and-seek with visitors, has died at the Oregon Coast Aquarium. He was 17.

The aquarium said Friday that Judge died of complications of old age, including arthritis and pneumonia.

He was found stranded as a small pup and took part in the aquarium's surrogate mother program.

After seven failed attempts to release Judge into the wild, he made the aquarium his life-long home.

Judge was famous for serenading trainers with a low wailing sound — and his keepers would sing back to him.

He also was the centerpiece

DA reviews case of sheriff's dog biting Columbia County inmate

Associated Press

ST HELENS — The Columbia County District Attorney's Office will review a case involving a jail inmate who was bitten by a sheriff's patrol dog.

Sheriff Jeff Dickerson told The Oregonian on Friday that he's reviewed body camera footage from the dog's handler and believes no laws were broken.

Authorities say the inmate, 47-year-old Christopher Bartlett, was being uncooperative and combative when deputies tried to move him to a different cell in August.

After a warning, the dog was released into Bartlett's cell.

The 3-year-old Belgian Malinois bit Bartlett's arm above the elbow until his handler called him off.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon calls the incident inhumane and wants to find Bartlett, who has since been released.

Bartlett's sister says her brother is homeless and suffers from mental illness.

Commissioners urge action on alleged mistreatment at youth jail in The Dalles

Associated Press

THE DALLES — The Wasco County Board of Commissioners is demanding action after a report claims the juvenile jail in The Dalles mistreats youth.

The East Oregonian reported commissioners Rod Runyon, Scott Hege and Steve Kramer each signed a letter last week urging the board of directors for the Northern Oregon Regional Correctional Facility to convene an emergency meeting to hand over control of the juvenile detention facility to an oversight committee.

Sarah Radcliffe, attorney for Disability Rights Oregon, created a report based on visits to the juvenile jail and interviews with 23 youth. She found the facility often shut youth in cells for hours at a time, and jail staff disciplined youth as young as 12 for talking while in line or looking anywhere but straight ahead.

Juvenile inmates on "disciplinary status" were subjected to weeks of isolation, according to the report, cut off from phone calls and visits. They ate alone and could not participate in education with their peers.

Getting off disciplinary status depended on earning passing marks on scorecards that staff filled out each shift. Radcliffe found there was no set number for how many shifts youth must pass.

NORCOR director Bryan Brandenburg has said juveniles at the jail do not suffer inhumane treatment, and he criticized the report for inaccuracies and exaggerations. However, Brandenburg said NORCOR has changed several practices in the wake of the report that went public Tuesday morning, including allowing students to have pens and journals in their cells and allowing students on disciplinary status to have calls and visitors.

He also said the facility did away with "silly rules" that prohibited youth from looking around or asking what time it was.
