Marbled murrelets now protected as endangered

A 4-2 vote by a state commission

Marbled murrelets nest in state-owned forestland in Clatsop County, but it isn't clear yet how an uplisting from threatened to endangered in Oregon could affect logging operations.

The Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission voted 4-2 on Friday to upgrade the small coastal bird's protected status. The Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife will have until June to complete survival guidelines.

The guidelines are expected to further restrict logging, though Dan Goody, district forester with the Oregon Department of Forestry's Astoria District, said foresters on state lands already follow strategies that are more conservative than required under the state's Forest Practices Act.

"What we're doing may meet what they come up with," he said.

Contractors routinely survey the Astoria District's forestland for murrelets and spotted owls. Goody pointed out some

McCartin to run for county commission

A regular presence at public meetings

George McCartin, a retired attorney who is a regular presence at public meetings, has announced he will run for a Clatsop County Board of Commissioners seat.

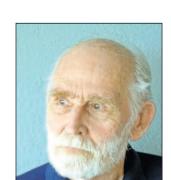

McCartin, 81, ran for Astoria City Council in the 2014 election and lost to Zetty Nemlowill.

McCartin will seek the District 1 seat held by Scott Lee, the board's chairman, who is not running for re-election. Andrew Davis, a medical analyst, has also announced his intention to run for the seat. The position covers Warrenton, Hammond and the west end of Astoria.

McCartin was an attorney in private practice and spent several years with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in San Francisco before moving to Astoria more than 12 years ago. He was also a KMUN classical music programmer.

McCartin said he is running to help unify the county board. He described the board as a dichotomy of commissioners taking hardline stances. Fiscal transparency, homelessness, criminal justice issues, mental health treatment and environmental concerns top his list of priorities should he be elected.

"I just feel we could get more done with the county and the cities working together," McCartin said. "Hopefully I could convince the other commissioners to join me in working through these issues."

On multiple occasions, he's asked for items to be pulled off consent calendars at Astoria City Council meetings and placed as business agenda items to prompt more discussion.

"I was bringing up issues sometimes that they don't want to deal with," McCartin said. "I think I could be on the opposite end and function quite well."

Other than the recent infighting on the county board, McCartin has been satisfied with Lee's performance as chairman.

"If he was running again, I wouldn't think of running under any circumstances," McCartin said. "I've been very impressed with his capacity as chairman all told."

Two other positions will be up for election in the May 15 primary. Peter Roscoe, a former Astoria city councilor and Fulio's Pastaria owner, has filed for the District 3 seat along with Pamela Wev, an Astoria land use consultant. Lisa Clement, co-owner of Clemente's Seafood, has not announced whether she will seek re-election.

Susana Gladwin, a Jewell farmer, has filed for the District 5 seat held by Commissioner Lianne Thompson, who has said she intends to run for another term.

The future of Birch Field in Alderbrook is up for debate.

Astoria looks to ease the burden on parks department, provide housing

By KATIE FRANKOWICZ

he Astoria City Council, looking to free up an overburdened Parks and Recreation Department, will discuss the potential sale of park land.

Some city councilors see selling underused park land as one way to put the department on a path to long-term sustainability and potentially open up land to development. Beyond parks, the sale of city-owned land could make property available for affordable housing, City Manager Brett Estes said. Any such effort on housing would be led by the community development department.

The four parks councilors plan to talk about at a work session Wednesday morning are ones the city has contemplated selling before. They include the site of Astoria's first post office, now marked by an obelisk, and a historic reconstruction of a customs house — both the first such establishments of their kind west of the Rocky Mountains. The other two sites are Birch Field, a marshy ballpark in Alderbrook, and the historic Tidal Rock site downtown across the street from the Blue Scorcher Bakery and Fort George Brewery.

PARKS UNDER REVIEW

The Astoria City Council on Wednesday will discuss the potential sale of four city parks.

 Birch Field: A wet, marshy ballpark just under an acre in size in Alderbrook that is considered in poor condition with very low use beyond dog walking.

• U.S. Custom House: A reconstruction of the first customs house built west of the Rocky Mountains that is located across the street from Safeway off Lief Erikson Drive.

• Post Office Park: A postage-stamp sized park on 15th Street between Exchange Street and Franklin Avenue. An obelisk commemorates where the first U.S. post office west of the Rocky Mountains was once located.

• Tidal Rock: A sunken, historic park with difficult public access on Duane Street and 15th Street.

Former dental assistant goes behind the wheel

The Thornburgs bought business a year ago

SEASIDE — Call a taxi in South County and likely Aalpha Shuttle and Taxi will answer.

Meet Jennifer Thornburg, part-time driver, co-owner and a voice for the thriving taxi service. The Thornburgs bought Arrow Shuttle about a year ago.

"My husband is the owner, I'm the helper," Thornburg said between pickups. "We live at the junction and my in-laws Bill and Patricia Love help run the business too."

Ray Thornburg, "a jack-ofmany trades," according to his wife, was working for a geologic consultant but lost his job during a downturn.

He found work with Dwayne Smith of Dwayne's Shuttle, intending to work for a summer. He ended up buying the business in 2014.

The Thornburgs subsequently acquired Arrow Taxi and Seaside Cab, merging the companies into Aalpha.

Thornburg never thought she'd be in the taxi business. "No. Never," she laughed. "I'm a dental assistant and I was working in Astoria for many years."

Aalpha has nine part- and full-time drivers, available 24/7.

"We've had to weed out a few over the years, but my husband is pretty good at detecting if something is not working out," she said.
