

Martin: Jan's coarseness was always paired with kindness

"Inspirational. That is the word that sums up my feeling for Jan and her impact on so many," Ryan Snyder wrote in an email. "From the moment I met her, I felt fortunate to experience a heart of integrity, and commitment ... a soul strong and courageous. And those principles were inspiring as you watched her approach life and death. I will miss her, her zest for friendships, her love of family, her joy in being a grandmother to our two kids, and the love I felt as her son-in-law."

Jan was raised on a North Dakota farm, where she lived with her family before marrying Steve Martin in 1967. The couple was living in The Dalles before purchasing the Surfsand Resort in 1979. Their portfolio expanded after purchasing multiple Cannon Beach properties, including the Viking Motel, the Haystack Resort, the Wayfarer Restaurant, the RV Resort and the oceanfront property that became the Stephanie Inn.

Dave Norstedt, the vice president of operations at Martin North, knew Jan Martin for years and said between the hard work ethic she learned on the farm and her gentle spirit, she was a natural in the hospitality industry.

"She spent early years cleaning guest rooms and working the front desk," Norstedt said. "Jan became known for exquisite taste in room decor and interior design. Jan later became the company president. Jan treated me with constant kindness and respect, as she did with all of her employees."

The couple was often credited for raising the caliber of hospitality in Cannon Beach, with major renovation projects to the Surfsand Resort reshaping the resort town's oceanfront aesthetic. In 2009, Jan Martin was integral in the design work behind the Stephanie Inn.

"She was kind of behind the scenes, and Steve got a lot of the attention. But they were equals, and what they accomplished was incredible," said Patrick Nofield of Escape Lodging.

Nofield first met Jan Martin when he took a job with Martin North right out of college in 1986. His memory of her is colored by her graciousness, her kindness and her discipline, he said. He always admired her ability to speak her mind when she thought you were wrong.

But her coarseness was always paired with kindness in the way she would give second chances or advice when you made a mistake, Nofield said.

"It felt like family working there in that way. The story of Jan to me is that she was the matriarch of Cannon Beach in a way," Nofield said. "She was a roll-up-your-sleeves and make-it-happen kind of woman. Escape Lodging wouldn't be what it is today without that mentorship from Steve and Jan. They were all about taking care of people, because the money after that takes care of itself."

For the past 15 years, Jan Martin has been in retirement, coming in and out of the community. But for many, her impact on the hospitality industry — and the town in general — will linger.

"For many of us who work at Martin North today, she was our boss, but most importantly she was our friend," Norstedt said. "A natural in the hospitality industry, Jan was the consummate host."

Plover: 'It's a different management strategy'

Signs mark areas where shorebirds, like the endangered western snowy plover, might be nesting in Nehalem Bay State Park. Similar signs will be removed in Gearhart.

Ranger Ken Murphy said. "The current restrictions will go away and we will monitor the site," he said.

If a nest is spotted, rangers could be on the scene within a couple of hours to put up fencing during the month-long incubation period.

"It's not as though we're abandoning the bird in this location," he said. "If anything, this is a plan that helps us manage this location better while also not putting restrictions in place that keep normal activity from going on that is traditional in this area. It's a different management strategy. We will still be here looking for the bird, hoping that it nests and managing it accordingly if it does."

Hundreds besiege Oregon Capitol to back cap on greenhouse gases

SALEM — Hundreds of protesters converged Monday on the Oregon Capitol to push lawmakers to adopt legislation that would place a cap on greenhouse gas emissions and impose fees on entities that exceed maximum levels.

With the Trump administration having abandoned the Paris climate agreement, several states have emphasized their own efforts to reduce greenhouse gases that contribute to global warming. In November, the governors of California, Oregon and Washington state attended global climate change talks in Bonn, Germany.

Now, a bill in the Oregon Senate and a similar one in the House aim to gradually reduce greenhouse gas emissions from the state to levels that are at least 80 percent below 1990 levels. Companies and facilities emitting more than 25,000 metric tons of carbon dioxide equivalents a year would be required to buy "allowances" every year to cover each ton of their emissions.

The two so-called clean-energy jobs bills, also known as cap and trade, are sponsored by 31 lawmakers, and each contain more than 30 pages. Some lawmakers have said this year's 35-day legislative session is too short to deal with such a complicated issue.

But it took center stage Monday as hundreds of protesters gathered outside the Capitol in sunny, chilly weather, carrying signs including ones that said "climate justice." One inflatable sign asked state Senate President Peter Courtney to "be a climate hero." The protesters then flocked to offices of legislators, spilling out the doors and into narrow hallways, before attending two committee hearings on the bills.

"There are about 400 to 500 people here today," marveled House Speaker Tina Kotek, one of the bills' sponsors. "I think that shows the people outside the building really want us to make it a priority for the session."

Courtney said before the Legislature convened that while he believes there must be laws to restrict greenhouse gas emissions, he expressed doubt that it could be finalized in the short session.

"Just the exemption area is complicated," he said, adding that he didn't want Oregon to copy another state.

Opponents have lined up against the measures, including Oregon Business & Industry.

"Oregon needs to identify the least cost way to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, rather than create a disincentive for Oregon business to remain in the state and for others to locate here," said Scott Parrish of Oregon Business & Industry, which said it represents 1,600 businesses.
