Flatbreads: Breads take time, but require fairly little effort

Zombie bread and other tips

Like a lot of the foods I write about, these breads require nothing exotic. They take time but fairly little effort. You really don't even need a particularly well-fed starter.

There are many better sources of information about sourdough than me. One I'd recommend is Mike Avery's Sourdoughhome.com. But I'll offer a few basic words of advice. If your starter develops a pink or orange liquid on top or an "off" smell, dump it and ask someone for a new starter-starter.

However, if it develops a gray liquid on top, just pour it off, and then feed it — it's a sign of a starving starter. According to Avery, thicker starters, that is, ones with a higher ratio of flour to water, need feeding less often, and can be stored longer.

Flour amounts in starter recipes are always "squishy" because no two starters have the same consistency. The good news is, the stakes are very, very low. You can virtually always adjust the consistency, rising power or sourness of your recipe by adding more flour, more water, or more time

Finally, these are best hot. By the next day, they become very buttery crackers. However, there is a very weird trick that really works for reviving hard, stale bread: Quickly rinse them in cold water. Stick them in a 300-degree oven. Check every two minutes. Your bread will be temporarily revived to its original glory.

Recipe Makes 10 flatbreads 2 c. healthy starter 1-2 c. flour, plus more for dusting

³/₄ tsp. salt ¹/₄ c. real butter Oil

Fine cornmeal or semolina

Combine salt and starter in a large bowl. Add flour, about a half cup at a time, until it forms a dough that starts to pull away from the sides of the bowl. If your starter is very thick, this may not take even a cup of flour. If it's thin like mine, it could require as much as two cups. You'll know it's ready when it's still slightly sticky, but stiff enough to hold together.

Flour a clean surface. Cover your clean hands in flour. Turn the dough out and knead it for about five minutes. If it's wet, and absorbing all of the flour or sticking to the counter, just add more flour. At first, the dough will be ragged looking, and not at all elastic. After a few minutes, it will become smoother, and spring back when you poke it.

Divide the dough into 10 equal pieces. Cover each in oil. Put the balls in a tray with plenty of space around each ---they will expand. Cover them with a damp, clean dishcloth, and put them somewhere warm (but not hot). I turn my oven to the lowest setting, turn it off as soon as it's done preheating, then stick the dough in there. Or I put it on top of my dryer if it's running.

Depending on the strength of your starter and the temperature, it could take anywhere from one hour to three hours for the balls to double in size.

Soften a stick of butter. On a floured surface, flatten each ball out until it is a rough rectangle shape about a quarter inch thick. Spread butter from edge to edge. Sprinkle on a very light dusting of cornmeal. This helps keep the layers separate. Fold the left third of the rectangle over the center. Fold the right third over, so that you have a "burrito" of dough. Paint the top with butter and cornmeal. Fold the top third down over the center, then fold the bottom third up, so that you end with a little square packet of dough.

Return these to your oiled tray and let them rest at least 15 minutes. You can put them in the fridge overnight. If you forget to cover them like I did, the tops will dry out and get even crispier when you cook them.

Heat a large sauté pan over medium-high heat. Using your hands or a rolling pin, flatten each dough packet. If you flatten it to a quarter-inch thickness, it will come out like a thick tortilla. If you go a bit thicker, you'll get a more bubbly, chewy end-product that is more like a piece of naan. Both are great.

When your pan is hot, but not smoking, add butter or oil. Place one or two pieces of dough in the pan. Cook two or three minutes, until there are browned bubbles, and no raw spots. Flip it over, and cook the other side. They are done when they're pliable and lightly browned, no longer doughy. If you can resist eating them straight out of the pan, store them in a warm oven until the rest are done.

Author's note: If you'd like a starter of your own, email me. I'll be happy to give you some starter-starter.
