

Regional jail changes immigration detainer policy

Change came after lawsuit was settled

NORCOR is a cinder block jail surrounded by a high chain-link fence and razor wire in an industrial section of The Dalles.

The Northern Oregon Regional Corrections facility in The Dalles no longer honors detainers from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement for people entering the jail on local charges.

The jail, known as NORCOR, officially changed its policy last month after settling a lawsuit with a Hood River man who said officials violated his constitutional rights.

NORCOR is one of at least two jails the state that house ICE detainees. That's despite a 30-year-old state law that limits local law enforcement agencies from assisting federal immigration agents. The policy change and lawsuit show that until recently, NORCOR also honored ICE detainers, despite a 2014 federal court ruling that found that ICE detainees did not provide independent authority to jails to hold people past the time when they should have been released on their local charges.

A detainer is a request from U.S. Department of Homeland Security to a jail to keep someone in custody for up to 48 hours until ICE can come get the person.

The correctional facility is about 80 miles east of Portland and serves as the regional jail for four neighboring counties: Gilliam, Hood River, Wasco and Sherman. It also houses detainees in ICE custody that federal immigration officers bring to and from the jail.

According to NORCOR's

website, the jail will continue to house ICE detainees, for which it's paid $80 per day, per detainee. NORCOR essentially serves as an overflow facility for ICE, which houses most immigration detainees in the Pacific Northwest at the Tacoma Northwest Detention Center.

What's changed is the practice surrounding people who come into the jail on local charges. Now the jail no longer accepts ICE detainers for them.

It's not clear how widespread the practice was at the jail.

NORCOR updated its website to reflect the new policy:

"Effective April 2, 2018, NORCOR no longer accepts detainers for local detainees," the website states. "This means that these individuals will be allowed to post bail and be released pursuant to their state court stipulations and conditions. Therefore, if a detainee has finished their sentence, been released by the court, or posted bail, they will not be held past their release."

NORCOR administrator Bryan Brandenburg wasn't available for an interview. But in response to questions about what the new policy means he replied in an email, "It means what it says."

Under its old policy NORCOR sent ICE the names, dates and places of birth and a list of charges for some individuals that were booked into the facility.

Astoria man accused of rape

An Astoria man has been arrested for allegedly committing numerous sex crimes against three females.

Larry Leach, 47, has been charged with five counts of first-degree rape, seven counts of first-degree sex abuse and two counts of using a child in a display of sexual conduct.

Leach was indicted on the charges in early April. He was arrested on an Astoria police warrant and transferred from New Mexico to the Clatsop County Jail, where he was booked Monday night.

A court date has not been set in Leach's case.

Seaside man arrested for assault

A Seaside man was arrested Monday after allegedly propositioning a woman for sex and then assaulting her.

Andres Peon De La Cruz, 31, allegedly grabbed a woman by her shoulder in an attempt to compel her to have sex. He then allegedly pushed her down a hill. Once she reached the bottom of the hill, he allegedly began assaulting her.

Seaside police arrested him just after 2 a.m. Monday near Avenues G and S.

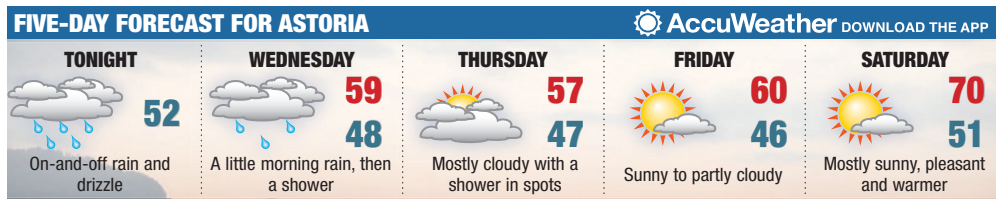

De La Cruz has been charged with second-degree kidnapping, fourth-degree assault, patronizing a prostitute, menacing and harassment.

Parks board member Crockett dies

The Daily Astorian

Astoria Parks and Recreation Board member Aaron Crockett died on Saturday due to health complications tied to advanced congestive heart failure.

Crockett, originally from Big Rapids, Michigan, joined the parks board in 2016 and worked at T. Paul's Supper Club in Astoria as a bartender and server. He was an avid runner, a familiar figure on local trails and at local races, but was just as well known for his love of puns. Like this one: "Raisin the bar!" Or this one: "I was going to make a belt made out of watches but it seemed like a waist of time."

"We are forever grateful for Aaron's time and service on the Astoria Parks and Recreation Board," said Norma Hernandez, board president, in a statement. "We will miss the sound of his motorcycle pulling up to our 6:45 a.m. board meetings, and strolling in with his frozen hair during the winter."

"May his family be warmed by the thoughts and prayers of our board and the impact he had on our community through his service to our parks," she added.

Astoria Mayor Arline

LaMear read a statement from the parks department at a City Council meeting Monday night and noted that Crockett's "warm, welcoming personality will be greatly missed." He "brought with him an energetic, youthful vitality that helped bring new perspective into our board."

T. Paul's hosted a fundraiser for Crockett in April to help him cover his expenses when he had to go to Portland for treatment for his heart condition. Now, the restaurant is organizing a potluck celebration of life that will be held May 20 at 4 p.m. at the Astoria Armory.

CORRECTION

Bridge designer incorrect — William Bugge designed the Astoria Bridge. An Oregon Public Broadcasting photo caption with a story on 3A Monday incorrectly said Conde McCullough designed the bridge.
