Ethics commission asked to weigh in on special session

Republican questions Brown's move

> By CLAIRE WITHYCOMBE Capital Bureau

SALEM — A Republican state senator is asking the state ethics commission to weigh in on whether Gov. Kate Brown acted appropriately in calling for Monday's special session as her campaign for re-election heats up.

Lawmakers on Monday voted to extend a state tax break to certain business owners at Brown's behest, despite chatter among some that she had called the special session in a move calculated to appear pro-business ahead of her re-election bid in November.

Under the Oregon Constitution, governors may convene a special session upon "extraordinary occasions."

"Needing a tax cut on small businesses to raise polling numbers for re-election is not an 'extraordinary occasion," wrote state Sen. Brian Boquist, R-Dallas, in the Friday letter, a copy of which he sent via email to the press Monday night. "Using public staff for the aforementioned purpose would, and does, raise serious questions on the adequacy of our ethics and elections laws."

He also noted that "merited or not," it was the "belief of many today" that the governor, in calling the special session that she was "furthering her re-election campaign using public resources."

The special session drew critics both on the right and the left

That came to a head Monday, with many Republicans inside the Capitol questioning the necessity of a special session and with the Portland chapter of the Democratic Socialists of America protesting the new tax break outside.

Several Democrats voted "no" on the proposal Monday, including state Sen. Mark Hass, D-Beaverton, who said that he didn't want to expand the tax break when the existing proposal hadn't been studied enough to know whether it was effective.

Boquist asked the commission a number of questions about the limits on a governor's use of his or her position, including whether it was permissible for the governor to use "public employees and funds to lobby for a bill in the self-proclaimed special session to support a governor's re-election.'

Brown, a Democrat, adamantly denied the allegation that the session was called for political purposes during a press conference Monday evening.

"Absolutely not," Brown

A spokesman for Brown deferred to those comments when the EO Media Group/ Pamplin Media Group Capital Bureau inquired about Boquist's letter late Monday, which was sent to the press after the governor's press conference.

Boquist also wrote that it appears there is a loophole "large enough to drive a freight train through" in state ethics and elections laws that allows statewide elected officials — the governor, treasurer, secretary of state, attorney general and labor commissioner — to avoid state ethics requirements that other public officials must

Boquist wrote that his letter was not a complaint, but a request for an advisory opinion that "will be used for further action, though undetermined, but most likely to present legislation closing loopholes that appear to exist exempting the statewide elected officials in the executive branch from elections and ethical standards common of others."

The Capital Bureau is a collaboration between EO Media Group and Pamplin Media Group.

Recology assures Astoria on rates, recycling plans

Impact of policy change in China

> By KATIE FRANKOWICZ The Daily Astorian

China's new regulations on imported recyclable materials are affecting recycling and garbage companies' profits and some customers are seeing substantial increases to their recycling rates and surcharges.

But not in Astoria. At least not yet.

Carl Peters, general manager for Recology Western Oregon, the company that handles garbage collection in the city, assured the City Council Monday night that the company is "still recycling, the routes are running." There are no major rate increases on the horizon or plans to stop collecting recycling.

"Those things are not coming here, at least not now," Peters said. The company, he wrote in a letter to the city, remains "committed to providing the opportunity to recycle to our customers and have no plans for any landfilling of collected recyclable materials in the foreseen future."

Recology provided the city with its annual rate review Monday night. The only rate change will be a slight increase for onetime use of a dumpster. The 3 percent increase reflects the extra amount Recology must now pay to dispose of material.

Prior to this year, China would accept a contamination level of 5 percent on imported recyclable materials, and many facilities on the West Coast were designed to meet this standard, Peters said. Now, the contamination level must be a mere 0.5 percent — well under what the facilities can guarantee, and even beyond what available technology is capable of providing.

Where companies once saw a profit from mixed recycling, now they are paying for it, Peters said.

For now, Recology plans to combat the issue of contamination in recycling with education, sending out flyers to remind people what can and cannot be recycled and how to prepare recyclable items for pickup.

Peters told the council some materials may not be allowed in commingled recycling in the future, common items like yogurt cups, aseptic packaging used for milk cartons or soup, and other items. But this is not certain yet, he emphasized.

He added that even if such items were no longer able to be recycled, they could still find a home. China may not want plastic, for instance, but other companies might have ways to repurpose items.

State: Cooke can't move juvenile Atlantic salmon to net pens

Associated Press

OLYMPIA, Wash. Washington state fish managers have denied a request by Cooke Aquaculture to move thousands of juvenile Atlantic salmon from its hatchery to marine net pens in Kitsap County.

The Department of Fish and Wildlife said it rejected the company's application because State lawmakers in March passed legislation to phase out marine Atlantic salmon aquaculture. The industry has operated for decades in Washington but came under heavy criticism after tens of thousands of non-native fish escaped from net pens near Cypress Island in Skagit County into waterways last summer.

fish in state waters when current leases expire in 2022. Cooke currently has two leases with the state.

Cooke plans to continue operating until then, agency officials said, and in late April, the Canada-based company sought permission to move 800,000 juvenile fish from its hatchery near Rochester to grow out to adult size in net

State fish health manager Ken Warheit called it an "exotic strain" that differs from the variety that had been present in the eastern Pacific Ocean. creating an "unknown risk that made it unacceptable."

He said there is a differthe move would increase the risk of fish disease transmis- leases and permits for opera- leases and permits for opera- Tests taken from samples issue is that it's unknown and Cooke did not immediately respond to an email seeking comment.

State officials also said that Cooke proposed putting the juvenile fish into pens that had not been empty for at least 30 days, a move that contradicted its own management plan.

Following the August collapse of net pens at Cypress Island, the state agency began requiring that fish be tested for PRV before they are transferred.
