BUYING A MOTORCYCLE

Dealer or private party

Although buying a motorcycle from a private party may save you a little money, the safest way to protect your investment is to purchase from an authorized dealer.

One of the advantages you'll find when buying used or new from your local dealer is a wider variety of motorcycles. You'll also enlist the help of an expert who can fit you into the best bike for your experience levels. If you're looking to get rid of your bike, a dealer will also give you the opportunity to trade it in rather than having to prepare it for a sale.

Dealer advantages

Just like a used car lot, motorcycle dealerships may offer a certified pre-owned guarantee and warranty. This shows that the vehicle has been properly inspected and any mechanical or safety issues have been corrected. Many motorcycle repairs can be expensive. Eligibility for an included or extended warranty can ensure your investment will be repaired by professionals and save you money later.

A dealership can also give you the opportunity to legally test drive a motorcycle. When testing a bike from a private seller you may find yourself operating a vehicle that is not properly registered or lacks insurance. If you get caught behind the handlebars, you may be subject to expensive fines and fees from law officials.

Dealing with a private party

If you do decide to make a private purchase, make sure to research the motorcycle's history. You should receive a vehicle history report to reveal accident history, how many owners it's had, an accurate odometer reading and any recorded-service history. You may also want to visit a reputable mechanic to have them check the bike over.

Keep in mind that a private purchase will be on an "as-is" basis after a sale. Ask yourself if the risk of a bad investment is worth saving a few dollars during the initial sale, and shop around at your local dealerships. You may actually find comparable deals on their lots.
