

Salmon: Several critical streams flow through the North Coast

"Poor logging practices by the Oregon Department of Forestry is causing real harm to the Oregon Coast coho and commercial fishing families who depend on these magnificent fish for their livelihoods," said Glen Spain, the northwest regional director for the Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Associations and the Institute of Fisheries Resources, both plaintiffs in the case.

"Stronger protections for streams to protect the coho ... is decades overdue."

Together, the forests cover a half-million acres stretching from the Washington state border to the central Oregon coast.

About 2,500 miles of roads have been built in them to accommodate logging, according to court papers.

Logging activity increases the risk of landslides and of sediment falling into the streams where the salmon breed and grow to maturity before venturing to the Pacific Ocean.

A new lawsuit claims logging in the Clatsop State Forest harms coho salmon.

the Tillamook State Forest and several others run through the Clatsop State Forest, according to the lawsuit.

Between 1 and 2 million salmon returned to their natal streams in this region — an area stretching from Seaside to Port Orford — in 1900.

The number of returning coho salmon has now dropped below 76,000, court papers say.

Other plaintiffs are the Center for Biological Diversity, the Native Fish Society and Cascadia Wildlands.

Mark Morgans, area manager of the Lewis & Clark Timberlands for Greenwood Resources, is not convinced the lawsuit's claims are justified by scientific research. But even a lawsuit that focuses on the state has the potential to impact private timber enterprises, he said.

"If a political — not biologically justified — decision is made to change forestry regulations on public land, then proponents typically assert those changes should occur on private land, too," he said.

"Society may choose to change how their lands held in public trust are managed for some perceived value and then we all pay those costs."

Morgans manages private timberland but said companies like Hampton Lumber, with a mill in Warrenton, rely on several sources for raw material, including state timber sales, private timber sales and outside purchases. Increased regulations could negatively impact that business as well as the vendors they supply.

Riverfront: City set aside around $80,000 for project

City councilors gave their approval Wednesday for City Manager Brett Estes to sign a contract with consultants and begin the lengthy process of collecting public input and developing code language for the Urban Core with the Astoria Planning Commission. They expect the process to take up to a year.

"A fast code amendment is six months," Estes said.

Rather than wait for grant money to come through to fund work on the Urban Core next year at the earliest, city councilors asked staff in February to use capital improvement money to begin this year. Johnson, Estes, other city staff and consultants with Angelo Planning Group will begin to collect public input and work with city leaders to develop codes.

The city set aside around $80,000 for the project, and the consultants' time is expected to cost about $48,000. Estes believes the entire project will come in under the total available amount.

"I don't think we're going to be surprised by what we hear in these public hearings," City Councilor Cindy Price said.

Price, who has pushed the city to finish the Riverfront Vision Plan, expects residents will be concerned about preserving open areas and public space.

"I suspect it's going to be

'I suspect it's going to be even more advocating for open spaces and for preserving what we have, reusing the buildings that are there, not building out over the water ... not allowing a lot of new development, period.'

even more advocating for open spaces and for preserving what we have, reusing the buildings that are there, not building out over the water ... not allowing a lot of new development, period," she said.

The historic downtown and surrounding woods and waterways are what makes Astoria attractive to people and are the main reasons it is thriving today, she said, arguing that the city should want to minimize new development.

But City Councilor Bruce Jones countered that the purpose of the Riverfront Vision Plan is not to ban development, but to find balance.

The Urban Core discussions will go through a public input process first and then to the Planning Commission before heading to City Council. Three planning commissioners attended the work session Wednesday, but only one of them spoke when Mayor Arline LaMear opened up the meeting to public comment.

Planning Commissioner Jan Mitchell said the city "dodged a bullet" when the economic downturn in 2008 ended several plans to build condos along the waterfront. Some city councilors worry such development now could make affordable and workforce housing even more difficult for people to find and create a community of second homeowners.

Mitchell wanted to remind the council: "The choices made for people who live in Astoria ultimately benefit the people who visit Astoria."

Astoria will look to clarify land use on the downtown stretch of the Columbia River.
