

Suicidal man rescued from ocean near Sunset Beach

The Daily Astorian

A suicidal man was rescued Thursday from the Pacific Ocean near Sunset Beach.

About 9:45 a.m., the man made suicidal comments and walked into the ocean wearing a bag full of weights, according to the Clatsop County Sheriff's Office. Sheriff's deputies made contact with the man but were initially unable to convince him to get out of the water. They were, however, able to remove the bag of weights around his body.

After resisting deputies, the man turned and walked back into the surf. A Coast Guard helicopter arrived moments later and dropped a rescue swimmer. The man showed the swimmer but was dissuaded from swimming further into the ocean.

A sheriff's deputy also walked into the surf, eventually convincing the man to head back to shore. The man was then taken to a hospital.

"The amount of dedication, courage and compassion these deputies showed goes above and beyond, and, as sheriff, I am extremely proud of their selfless courage and commitment to the safety of others no matter who they are or what issues they may have," Sheriff Tom Bergin said.

Oregon State Police say an 18-year-old girl has died after colliding with a log truck on U.S. Highway 101 near Beaver.

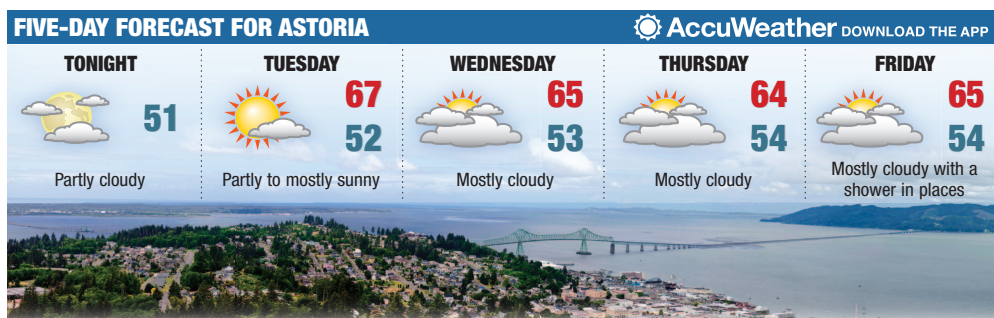

Law enforcement officials say Mikayla Michelle

Howard was driving a 2003 Saab when it crossed into the other lane for an unknown reason on Friday morning. The car then hit a 2018 Kenworth log truck head on.

According to a news release on Sunday, Howard was taken to a local hospital and later transported by LifeFlight for further treatment at Oregon Health & Science University. She eventually died Friday as a result of her injuries.

The driver of the log truck wasn't injured.

Washington state eyes dog to detect invasive mussels on boats

Associated Press

SPOKANE, Wash. — A dog could soon be helping check boats and prevent invasive mussels from entering the state, the Washington State Department of Fish and Wildlife said.

The agency tells KREM-TV that the dog will likely be stationed in Spokane and work mostly at the State-line boat check station looking for quagga and zebra mussels. The agency said it will use grant money to purchase the canine help sometime next year.

"When you have physical inspections with a technician, an inspection could take five to 10 minutes," said Eric Anderson of the Department of Fish and Wildlife. "When you have a dog, it's able to sniff the outside of the boat. That inspection could go down to maybe a minute or two minutes."

Quagga and zebra mussels siphon in water to pluck out microscopic organisms that can throw food chains out of balance, and their sheer numbers in attaching to surfaces can clog pipes at reservoirs and damage boat motors. Giant water bodies turning aquamarine blue is a sign that the base of the food chain is being depleted, risking starvation for other species, including sport fish.

Quagga mussels approach

an inch in length while zebra mussels can be about twice that size. The species are native to Russia and Ukraine, and are believed to have arrived in the U.S. in the 1980s aboard ships that released ballast water into the Great Lakes.

They attach to boats and trailers and travel long distances, and their microscopic larvae can survive in water inside a boat or even an angler's wading boots. Also, the mussels can sense toxins and close their shells.

Officials said a dog could even detect the mussels if they make it into a local lake.

"It's huge," Anderson said. "It's going to be a great asset to the program."
