A 'rest stop' for salmon on the Willamette River

Culvert replacement could help fish

The Oaks Bottom Wildlife Refuge is the largest undeveloped stretch of the Willamette River flood plain below Willamette Falls. It's 175 acres of prime habitat.

But for nearly a century, a small culvert has blocked young salmon from swimming into this sanctuary in the heart of southeast Portland.

Last week, Portland and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers started construction on a project that's designed to let the salmon back in.

The project will replace an old culvert that's 5 feet in diameter with a new one that's 16 feet wide and 10 feet tall. It's also restoring the habitat leading into the Oaks Bottom Wildlife Refuge by deepening the side channels and adding large wood and native plants.

Young salmon swimming down the Willamette River need places to stop to eat and to hide from predators on their way to the ocean, said Ronda Fast, environmental coordinator with Portland's Bureau of

Joseph Winters/Oregon Public Broadcasting

Construction crews install a new culvert that will make it easier for fish to travel between the Willamette River and the Oaks Bottom Wildlife Refuge.

Environmental Services.

But once they pass Willamette Falls in Oregon City, most of the places that would provide these "rest stops" have been wiped out by development.

"Oaks Bottom is such an important wildlife refuge that salmon can't currently get to," Fast said. "There's not a lot of habitat left within this stretch of the river between Willamette Falls and the confluence with the Columbia where salmon can find food and shelter on their journey."

Fast said the Oaks Bottom restoration project is designed to welcome young salmon into the cool, slow-moving waters of the wildlife refuge, where there will be lots of food for them to eat.

"We are removing barriers for salmon so they can access prime habitat," she said.

Jim Adams, project manager for the Army Corps, said juvenile salmon need side-channel areas like the Oaks Bottom Wildlife Refuge, but don't have any for a long stretch of the Willamette River through the Portland

"This is the last existing off-channel wetland area between Willamette Falls and the Columbia River," he said. "There is a huge gap that allows for a lot of predation. A significant amount of fish get eaten before they get there."

metro area.

Adams said the Oaks Bottom area is rare "low-hanging fruit" that can be easily restored to help salmon survive. The city and the Corps also have plans to replace another culvert blocking salmon habitat on Tryon Creek in southwest Portland.

'It gets harder and harder to find areas that haven't been developed that can be easily restored to their near original condition," he said.

After the new culvert is installed at Oaks Bottom, the berm, the trail and railroad on top will be replaced. The project has closed a section of the Springwater Corridor Trail through October.

Trump administration agrees to protect West Coast humpbacks

Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — In a settlement with environmental groups, the Trump administration has agreed to designate critical Pacific Ocean habitat for endangered humpback whales.

The animals face threats from getting tangled in fishing gear, oil spills and being struck by ships. Federal authorities have designated three groups of West Coast humpbacks as endangered or threatened.
