

Plans on making untraceable 3D guns can't be posted

Plastic guns a security risk

Cody Wilson, with Defense Distributed, holds a 3D-printed gun called the Liberator at his shop in Austin, Texas.

A U.S. judge in Seattle blocked the Trump administration Monday from allowing a Texas company to post online plans for making untraceable 3D guns, agreeing with 19 states and the District of Columbia that such access to the plastic guns would pose a security risk.

The states sued to stop an agreement that the government had reached with Austin, Texas-based Defense Distributed, saying guidelines on how to print undetectable plastic guns could be acquired by felons or terrorists.

U.S. District Judge Robert Lasnik extended a temporary restraining order, and his new decision will last until the case is resolved. He said Cody Wilson, owner of Defense Distributed, wanted to post the plans online so that citizens can arm themselves without having to deal with licenses, serial numbers and registrations.

Wilson has said that "governments should live in fear of their citizenry."

"It is the untraceable and undetectable nature of these small firearms that poses a unique danger," Lasnik said. "Promising to detect the unde-etectable while at the same time removing a significant regulatory hurdle to the proliferation of these weapons — both domestically and internationally — rings hollow and in no way ameliorates, much less avoids, the harms that are likely to befall the states if an injunction is not issued."

The State Department had reached the settlement with the company after the agency removed the 3D gun-making plans from a list of weapons or technical data that cannot be exported overseas.

The states argued that the federal agency didn't follow the law when it removed 3D guns from the munitions list. They said the government was supposed to notify Congress and provide a 30-day window before making a change to that list, but it did not.

Lasnik criticized the government for switching its position on the threat posed by the 3D gun-making plans.

Up until April, the government argued the distribution of the guidelines "posed a threat to world peace and the security and foreign policy of the United States," the judge said.

Despite those fears, the government decided that it only needed to restrict the international availability of firearms up to .50 caliber. That's when they reached a settlement with the 3D gun company.

There was no indication the government evaluated the unique characteristics of the plastic guns when it considered deleting that category of weapons from the prohibited list, the judge said.

"Nor is there any reasoned explanation for its change in position," Lasnik said.

The federal government declined to comment on the judge's ruling.

A lawyer with the U.S. Justice Department had argued against the injunction, saying possessing 3D plastic guns is already against the law, and the federal government is committed to enforcing that law.

But the judge said it wasn't enough.

"While the court appreciates the earnestness with which this commitment was made at oral argument, it is of small comfort to know that, once an undetectable firearm has been used to kill a citizen of Delaware or Rhode Island or Vermont, the federal government will seek to prosecute a weapons charge in federal court while the state pursues a murder conviction in state court," Lasnik said.

Washington Attorney General Bob Ferguson praised the ruling.

"Once again, I'm glad we put a stop to this dangerous policy," Ferguson said. "But I have to ask a simple question: why is the Trump administration working so hard to allow these untraceable, undetectable 3D-printed guns to be available to domestic abusers, felons and terrorists?"

Brown outlines her agenda on education policy

Emphasis on preschool, class sizes

By PARIS ACHEN
Capital Bureau

Gov. Kate Brown released her seven-step education policy agenda Monday, components of which will be included in her proposed state budget, her spokeswoman said.

"The governor strongly believes that in order to effect change for Oregon's students, a multipronged approach is vital," said Kate Kondayan, a press secretary in Brown's office.

The press secretary did not answer a question from the EO Media Group/Pamplin Media Group about how much the education policy agenda would cost.

The governor's proposed two-year state budget is due in late November. At 77 percent, Oregon has one of the worst graduation rates in the nation and one of the shortest school years, according to federal statistics.

Her plan would:

- Increase access to preschool for low-income children. She plans to propose funding to send 10,000 more children to preschool in the next budget and 40,000 by 2025.

- Decrease the median class size from 22 to 20 in kindergarten, maintain 23 in first grade, and reduce the size from 24 in the second grade and 25 in the third grade to 23.

- Mandate a minimum 180-day school year.

- Accept recommendations from a policy advisory committee on policies to create "safe and effective schools," including enhancing access to counselors and mental health professionals.

- Boost access to career-technical education.

- Enhance support for educators and high quality instruction.

State Rep. Knute Buehler, the Republican nominee for governor, released his education platform in late June.
