

Property: Council will hold several sessions, hearings expansion going into making a more robust police station. But so far, most of the City Council is feeling considerable sticker shock and doubts voters would pass an expensive bond measure.

“I have my reservations about South Wind,” City Councilor Nancy McCarthy said. “Sounds like one hole digging into another hole, so to speak. It just seems like way too much money to be studying South Wind as a City Hall site.”

The new assessment made Benefield question what kind of development could be considered at South Wind. The Cannon Beach Academy, a charter school, opened last year, in part to fill the void left by the closing of the Cannon Beach Elementary School in 2013 over tsunami concerns. The city initially pursued South Wind as the site for an elementary school.

South Wind has been largely cleared of timber but is still surrounded by forested land.

“I know (Mayor Sam Steidel’s) view is not just to build a City Hall and a police station, but I can’t imagine the charter school and their sponsors and supporters spending the money to build a school on a risky site,” he said.

City Councilor George Vetter, who has been the most supportive of building City Hall at South Wind, wants more information before making a decision.

“This is our first opportunity to do something there,” Vetter said. “Are (residents) going to vote for a City Hall that will be impacted by tsunami anyway?”

Different scopes

Part of the surprise came from the fact initial assessments done on South Wind showed it was “generally a good place to build,” with relatively little landslide risk in the area proposed for development, said Tom Horning, who did the geotechnical testing for the city in 2013 prior to the sale.

The nature of what Horning was asked to study, however, is different than doing geotechnical work for a specific site. The objective five years ago was to do a quick, surface-level evaluation of the property to see if it was generally developable and justified to purchase. Costs to do what is necessary to make development happen was not part of the original inquiry.

It is also possible a more in-depth analysis of deeper borings into the soil could reveal new insights not available at the time. Without seeing a completed geotechnical report, Horning can’t comment on what may differ from today’s analysis versus his five years ago. But it’s possible the three layers of woody debris geologists are interpreting as landslides could actually be entombed forests that were killed by suddenly deeper swamp waters from subsidence during great earthquakes.

“Those peat layers, in other words, are 80,000-year-old ghost forests,” said Horning, a geologist who serves on the Seaside City Council.

What the area was being analyzed for is also important, said Mark Morgans, of Greenwood Resources, who helped with the sale. The goal was property that would be considered safer relative to the former Cannon Beach Elementary School’s location on Spruce Street.

“Our intent was to sell a big enough footprint for an elementary school that would service Cannon Beach, and on that area at least 10 percent of it would be safe and geologically stable enough to build that facility,” Morgans said. “It’s much safer than where (the former school) is, but now we’re talking main city infrastructure. That’s a different level of risk and exposure.”

Patterson said part of what makes South Wind a complex and expensive location for a City Hall project is the fact police stations are required to be built to the highest possible seismic standards in the building code, requiring more emergency-proof infrastructure in comparison to a housing development or school.

But whatever is built, the risks are still present, she said.

“We would not require structurally (a school) to withstand the same intensity of an earthquake, but it still could not be built if the ground would be settling,” Patterson said. “So the deep foundation information we learned would apply to the (building of a) school.”

Hearings

The City Council will hold several work sessions and public hearings through January and February on the topic. The city is now aiming for a November bond issue — instead of May — to allow more time for geotechnical work and deliberation.

Once a site is chosen, St. Denis said the price tag could be lower because design and engineering work will be narrowed to specifics rather than relying on “worst-case scenario” estimates.

“This is the first step in trying to make thoughts about what we’re doing,” Steidel said. “As far as I’m concerned we’re just getting information about whether this is worth making a decision over.”

Skater: ‘I’m in good health, but I’ve found my niche here’ could make a $1 pledge,” he said.

So, how does one train for such an event? McClelland spends a lot of time on a rowing machine and, at least once a week, tries to skate 25 to 40 miles in one push.

“I mean, the short answer is, ‘I never do enough,’” he said.

When he enters the track in January, McClelland’s focus is to limit breaks or, at least, not sit during rest times.

“Your brain’s always telling you you should stop, you’re tired, your knees are hurting. It’s just so easy to quit,” he said. “The best strategy is to just, kind of, stay motivated and not get off the track.”

Once the race is over, McClelland plans to rest Saturday, fly home Sunday and go to work Monday. Right around the time of the flight is when the searing soreness should start to kick in, he said.

“On Monday when I go in, I’m hurting,” McClelland said.

If he hits the 200-mile mark, McClelland may decide not to enter the event next year. But three years after picking up the sport seriously, long-distance skating will remain a primary hobby.

“I’m in good health, but I’ve found my niche here,” he said.
