Trees: Thousands were given away following a successful expo in Chile

reflecting pool were created, and thousands of square feet of wooden framed stucco exhibit halls and pavilions were constructed in the Spanish Renaissance style reminiscent of Northern African buildings with arches and swooping roofs and lots of metallic paint adornments. One local wag was heard to call them "Stick Castles." The only real permanent structures left after the event were the Fairmont Hotel, which is still present in a very changed form, the National Cash Register Building (now McMenamins St. Johns Theater & Pub) and the Forestry Building, a log hall constructed of giant Douglas firs. It was destroyed in a spectacular fire in 1964.

The biggest new technology hit of the exposition was incandescent electric lights. Strung on decorative poles about the grounds, the lights reflected on the pond to give a festive, twinkling air to the warm summer nights. Visitors swarmed the place by the trolley and

To bring us back to the monkey puzzle tree story; one of these buildings was leased by the government of Chile and became the Chile Pavilion. To help promote Chile's economy, the government built a nursery to produce thousands of cloned starts of the national tree to give away at the pavilion. Since the expo was a huge hit, thousands were given away in the first two months, and the Chileans had to commission a ship to bring thousands more. It is arguable that nearly all of the monkey puzzle trees in Northwest yards are either these very starts (at 100-plus, they'd just be toddlers now) or their descendants.

To this day, every time I pass a monkey puzzle tree, I can't help but smile, even laugh. If you listen close, you may hear me mutter: "Where are the monkeys, Dad?"
