

Onions: Red ones are best used raw or for pickling

Be they yellow, red or white

Red onions are best used raw or for pickling. Cooking tends to turn them green or even Cookie-Monster blue.

White onions are pungent, sweet onions are sort of sweet.

Yellow onions are cheap and have the nicest flavor in cooked dishes. They tend to have more of the tear-inducing chemicals, but according to Food Lab author and culinary genius J. Kenji Lopez-Alt, those chemicals contribute to their great flavor when cooked.

It requires a bit of patience, but it's worth chopping up a pile of onions (really — like, at least six to eight medium-sized ones — they're 75 percent water) and taking them on a magical journey of caramelization.

Out of the frying pan, onto the table

Put a large frying pan on medium heat. Add a pat of butter, a glug of olive oil and your finely diced onions. Throw in a little rosemary if you want, and sprinkle a light dusting of salt and pepper over them. Put a lid on the pan. Take it off after a few minutes.

Congratulations! You've just "sweated" your onions, which breaks down the cells and jump-starts the process of evaporating their high water content. Gently stir your sweaty onions. Within five minutes, they'll turn translucent and soft. If you're using them as a base for something else, this is usually where you'd add some wine or sherry, turn up the heat and cook it off.

You have options: Add stock and seasonings, your vegetable of choice, and simmer to make easy soup. Add carrots and celery, cumin and paprika as you saute, then stir in lentils or garbanzos and some tomato sauce to make a simple stew. Or add cumin, oregano and chili powder, then add ground beef to make all-American "taco meat." Or blend a couple of spoonfuls of flour into the onions and brown it a bit. If you blend in stock, you've got gravy. If you blend in milk, you've got a white sauce. Add Italian herbs, red wine and good canned tomato sauce, and you've got spaghetti sauce.

Real onion dip

Feeling daring? Stand by, and stir. Every couple of minutes, add a couple of tablespoons of water, scrape all the bits off the side and bottom, and stir some more. Your onions will gradually start to turn brown and smell like heaven. Keep going for about 15 to 20 minutes, adjusting heat to prevent them from scorching, until they're a fragrant, sweet deep brown jam.

You can spread this on toast with goat cheese. You can add beef stock and simmer to make French onion soup. But the Super Bowl is coming, so I suggest real onion dip. Stir the onion jam into about two parts sour cream and one part mayonnaise. Eyeball it, starting out with maybe a cup total, and add more to taste. Add a squeeze of lemon and a dash of Worcestershire sauce. Feel triumphant, knowing your dip will be a balm to the soul as the Patriots storm the field yet again.
