

Exhibit: Vaughn highlights impact of early women physicians into the Owens-Adair building, until the current location of the hospital opened in 1977.

Vaughn highlights the impact of early female physicians, from Dr. Bethenia Owens-Adair, who claimed to be the first traditionally trained female physician in the Pacific Northwest, to Dr. Nellie Smith-Vernon, who advised Astoria during a Spanish flu outbreak during World War I that killed more than 110 people.

She illustrates nursing education, which she said has been around in some manner for 75 of the past 110 years. St. Mary's operated a nursing school from 1905 to 1948, with Clatsop Community College starting its program in 1983.

The exhibit recounts the Patrick v. Burget antitrust case that reached from Astoria to the U.S. Supreme Court. Local surgeon Timothy Patrick accused private partners at the former Astoria Clinic, which housed 75 percent of doctors in the city, of colluding against him. The Supreme Court ruled in Patrick's favor in 1988, along the way bankrupting many of the other doctors and putting the clinic out of business.

Vaughn can't recount the massive number of hours she spent researching the county's medical history, but said it was fascinating to see the weird contraptions and pseudoscience patients were exposed to in treatment.

She hopes people come away from the exhibit both edified and glad that health care has come so far.

"There's always this reassurance people feel that medical practice has evolved, that things aren't as barbaric or horrific as they maybe once were," she said.

A new medical history exhibit includes old machines such as an eye-testing apparatus from Dr. Harvey Rones, an optometrist and inventor who practiced locally for more than 40 years.

Whitney: 'I'm living my dream'

Whitney has long been attracted to the fast-paced nature of the emergency responder world. Before becoming a police officer, he spent two years as a medic for a volunteer emergency medical services team.

He found that his upbeat personality helped people in some of their worst moments.

"You meet people in very bad times ... and I always had a way of talking to people and cheering them up in these awful times," he said.

Almost a year on the job, and Whitney said he can't express how happy he is to be here.

"I'm just having the most fun," he said, beaming.

He's constantly in awe of the region's beauty — even though he's personally not a fan of large bodies of water. He likes policing in a small town, because he feels he gets to know the residents and they get to know him.

Leaving his hometown of 21 years, however, was difficult. With no family or friends, Whitney worried about establishing a new life on his own.

'THERE'S SO MANY THINGS YOU DON'T REALIZE YOU NEED HELP WITH UNTIL YOU DON'T HAVE ANYONE THERE.'

"There's so many things you don't realize you need help with until you don't have anyone there," he said.

Those worries, however, have been put to rest. He feels the police department has stepped up to become his new community, helping with things like finding a doctor or jump-starting his car.

And he suspects things are only going to get better.

"There's nothing to be mad or sad about," he said. "I'm living my dream."
