

City of Books: A city block of Portland dedicated to the written word

I love the magic of small book stores, too. In high school, I found many of my favorite books with the help of kind book people in Klindts in The Dalles — a bookstore founded in 1870 and the oldest in Oregon.

In this age of Amazon and instant books, I have found it heartening that the younger generation — including my daughters — would much rather read physical books over any e-book format.

Studies have found that those who have grown up with the ever-present internet at their fingertips prefer printed materials — books that you can hold in your hand and turn a paper page. Millennials are a generation of book readers and there is no ebb in demand for printed books despite the lower prices and convenience of electronic published materials.

We love our little library and local bookstores, but every year we venture to Powell's — a city block of Portland dedicated to the written word.

My first visit was with my dad when I was in middle school — imagine a kid from a town so small that it didn't have a library — a kid so curious that he read the entire 22-volume World Book Encyclopedia start to finish. Imagine that kid discovering a bookstore as big as a city block.

While it is an icon that seems stuck in the Bud Clark era for Portland, the original Powell's books started in Chicago with a $3,000 loan from the likes of three University of Chicago professors — including author Saul Bellow. That Powell's dealt in used and rare books and was a going concern when Michael Powell's father, Walter, started another Powell's books in Portland in 1971.

When Michael's dad lost the lease on his used bookstore in the late 1970s, Michael joined his dad in Portland and they took over an old American Motors dealership on Burnside creating a store that would eventually expand to fill the city block — and add two floors on top of that. It contains 98,000 square feet of shelf space and host more than 2 million books for sale. It has also expanded to a few other locations around the city — but this — this is what people mean when they said Powell's.

City of Books is an apt title. It is no cathedral, but rather a living, bustling, churning fortress of immortal ideas crying out for life in the hand and eyes of a reader. Books are a form of immortality, crystallizing an author's moment's inspiration or lifetime of learning in a durable compact, portable form.

There is nothing quite like finding yourself in a bookstore so vast that a map is essential, as is a plan to meet up with your companions at an agreed upon location and time — so easy it is to get lost among the stacks and shelves, color coded rooms and multiple floors of immortal words.

Powell's still buys and sells used books, and so you can clear your shelves at home and subsidize your purchases. It is hard to let go of a book you love, but there are plenty of books that daunt and dissappoint. You have to kiss a lot of frogs, or so the saying goes. We gather up the books we can stand to part with and bring them down to sell.

Unsurprisingly we somehow always return home with more than we left.

Powell's has so many new books now, but it is the used books I seek. This year I found a first edition "North to the Orient" by Anne Morrow Lindbergh. The northwest history section contains not only the latest scholarship and storytelling but forgotten stories and authors from a century ago. I never really go in knowing what I am looking for — although if you do, helpful employees can quickly point you in the right direction. Rather, I go in open to discovering some book that I didn't know I needed.

That is the joy of it, whether it be the library or the local bookstore or the warren of the City of Books — the finding of a book that you didn't know you wanted, the discovery of an author that speaks to your imagination.

Each year we make a trip to Powell's.

On a rainy afternoon, among the stacks of books, there is no better place.
