Low temperatures, high marks at Lower Columbia Invitational

The Astorian

Even with temperatures hitting season-lows, most of the athletes were setting season best marks on Saturday in the Lower Columbia Invitational track meet at St. Helens.

With a good mix of small schools and large schools, teams from Clatsop County all performed well in their areas of expertise.

The top throwers all won, with Astoria's Colton McMaster remaining undefeated in the shot put (55 feet, 6 inches) and discus (162-1), with over 40 throwers competing in each event; while Warrenton's Hunter Xochipiltecatl took second in the javelin (146-4), among 47 competitors.

On the girls side, Astoria sophomore Lily Meadows was second out of 38 entries in the shot put (32-5).

In the distance races, Warrenton's Zander Moha set a personal best 2 minutes, 4.7 seconds in winning in the 800 meters, and he won the 1,500 meters in 4:21.69.

Tribes receive money to help study salmon reintroduction effort

By COURTNEY FLATT Northwest News Network

Bringing salmon back to the upper Columbia River will take a lot of time and a lot of money, according to the Upper Columbia United Tribes.

The tribes recently received $3 million from Washington state's supplemental budget — a big chunk of change that tribes said will help kick off the second phase of a decadeslong study.

However, the tribes still will need to find significant funding sources, especially from federal agencies, to cover the entire study phase, which adds up to an estimated $176 million spread over 21 years, said Laura Robinson, a policy analyst with Upper Columbia United Tribes.

Recently, momentum has built to help along the upper Columbia reintroduction studies, Robinson said.

"To get this large investment of funds from the Washington state Legislature and governor is really helping increase this momentum," Robinson said.

Most of the $3 million will come through the Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife starting July 1. The funds will cover work in Washington by the Colville, Spokane and Coeur d'Alene tribes.

In addition, the $3 million from the state will help provide equipment to three of the Upper Columbia United Tribes tribes, Rob-

The funds will help cover PIT tags, which allow researchers to track fish as fish swim downstream. Each tribe also will buy tanker trucks to trap and haul adult and juvenile salmon, which will help with cultural and educational releases, as well as with reintroduction studies, Robinson said.

Funds also will help tribes build rearing facilities, including net pins to rear and release juvenile fish. In addition, the Colville and Coeur d'Alene tribes plan to build facilities to rear fish, such as at Hangman Creek in Spokane. These funds will help the tribes design those hatcheries.

Courtney Flatt/Northwest News Network A line of about a dozen people passed buckets of summer Chinook salmon to be released into Hangman Creek.

Moreover, the state is joining in what Coeur d'Alene Tribe member Hemene James called a righteous endeavor, helping the ancestral salmon people of the upper Columbia become salmon people once again.

"The understanding that our old ones had when they put their pride aside and settled on our respective reservations — was that we would always be who we always were. At the center of that was the gift that the returning fish had always provided for us," James said. Hydropower dams have blocked salmon from the upper Columbia basin for up to 110 years. Dams built on the Spokane River, and later Chief Joseph and Grand Coulee dams on the Columbia River, were all built without fish passages.

In 2015, the Upper Columbia United Tribes began pushing in earnest for salmon reintroduction above the blocked area.

The tribes wrapped up initial feasibility studies in 2019. In the first phase of the study, the Upper Columbia United Tribes contributed $1.8 million, with federal agencies contributing $150,000, Robinson said.

So far, it's been difficult to get additional funding from the federal government for these studies, said Chris Donley, the Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife's Eastern Region fishery manager.

"The federal government has not been willing to fund a lot of the work that needs to take place to get to reintroduction," Don-
