MISS LAKE EMERGES WITH FLYING COLORS

Miss Mabel Lake who, according to the Oregonian, was arrested on a census enumerator's charge that she had stood upon the woman's traditional privilege of refusing to tell her age, disregarding the fact that it was Uncle Sam who wanted to know, emerged with flying colors from a hearing of the case held Thursday before United States Commissioner Marsh.
It was claimed by Miss Lake that C. E. Markham, the enumerator in question, had not exercised proper tact in accosting the young woman and that she was by no means chiefly to blame. She was discharged from custody, with the consent of Assistant District Attorney Evans.
Miss Lake was engaged in repairing a flume on her fruit farm, she said, when her attention was attracted by a remark, made by a stranger, that she might hurt her finger. She resented his familiarity and when he began to propound questions facetiously without explaining why he asked them, she at first refused to answer. Later, she said, she gave all the information except a part which related to her financial dealings. These omissions were supplied later at the office of Supervisor Beach.
Contrary to the report of the enumerator, Miss Lake said she had no hesitation in stating her exact age. She did not understand that the enumerator had a right to inquire as to whether there was a mortgage on her farm.
Miss Sarah E. Peck, a member of the faculty of Union college, near Lincoln, Neb., did not get off so easy. She was indicted by the federal grand jury on the charge that she had willfully refused to give her age to the census enumerator or to answer questions as to whether she had been married or divorced, was fined $10 by United States District Judge Munger, after she had entered her voluntary appearance. Her age has not yet been made public.
