After posting up on handling bees Bob Rand last week endeavored to corral a swarm of these insects which had made a home in a tree near his house. Securing a step ladder he carefully commenced to saw off the limb on which the hive was situated. After two or three movements of the saw 999,999 bees, according to Mr. Rand, issued from the hive with their business end in action. Dropping the saw he made the slide for life down the ladder and beat it for the house. All records for sprinting were broken, but the bees had him beaten to a whisper. His arms took on the rotary motion of a windmill, performing 3,000 revolutions a minute. Before he landed in his domicile six of the pursuing honey-makers had handed it to him in various places. Mr. Rand remarks that the next time he has a hunch to capture a swarm of bees he'll forget it before he thinks of it.
