The Line Shaft and Governor of Body
The spinal cord within the spinal column is the "lineshaft" of the body furnishing power to most of its organs and parts.

The spinal column is the "governor" controlling the nerve force to the vital organs and other parts of the body.

The Intervertebral foramen, with its continuous structures, is the "check valve" for the vital force.

Each vertebra and section of the spinal column is controlled by involuntary muscles.

The stimuli for these muscles are toxins within the organism, generally within the alimentary tract.

Injuries may move, or "subluxate" a vertebra to a position in which these muscles are unable in themselves to return to its proper position.

These involuntary muscles along the spinal column, as well as the subluxations from injuries, cause asymmetries in the position of the vertebrae.

Disease is the direct result of these changes along the spine.

Disease is not an "accident," but the result of definite physiological functions.
