places the barns are a part of or connected with the houses. The fields are small and well cultivated, but not much stock is to be seen anywhere. There are many neat hogs.

Don't Spray Apples.

In passing through the noted fruit district I noticed that the people do not spray or prune their trees, and between the rows of trees the space is taken up with small fruits and vegetables; consequently their apples are small and not a good merchantable fruit.

Dublin is a beautiful city, located on the river, and has a population of 300,000. It has many beautiful buildings and some cathedrals, also a castle. Many of the streets are wide and beautiful and the city has some splendid parks. Phoenix Park contains about 2000 acres, and has fine driveways and walks, pretty groves, etc. Nearly 700 deer of various colors roam at will through it. It also contains a good zoological garden.

An Irish Mother's Love.

I stopped one day to ask an old lady about a certain cathedral, and after she had answered my questions she said, "You are from America?" I answered "Yes." And with tears in her eyes she said that she had two sons in America and was afraid they would starve to death. Then she said, "You ought to know my boys," and I asked, "What is the name?" And she replied, "It is Murphy, and when I last heard from them they were in Butte." I answered, "It is hardly possible that I know your sons, for there are 656 Murphys in Butte and I live 1000 miles from there." As she wiped her eyes, I assured her that her sons would get along all right and could do better in America than in Ireland.

The Dublin Mountains, a few miles to the south and west of the city, form a beautiful background.

Dublin has many poor people in the congested districts, and the city has inaugurated a system to relieve them. They are procuring land outside of the city and erecting small cottages, where the people can have their gardens, etc. It is, to my mind, a splendid system and should be adopted in any city.

Our next stop was at Cork, one of the oldest cities in Ireland. It is located on the River Dee, and has a population of about 80,000. The city has many narrow, winding streets and many poor people live along some of them. In one part of the city there is a corporation building covering more than a large block, surrounded by streets. It is one story high and proportioned off into small rooms of various sizes with alleyways about six feet wide. The rooms are rented out for 30 pence per week for one about 8 by 10 feet to the poor class of Irish merchants, who have the rooms filled with everything to wear, use, eat or throw away; in fact, it is a conglomeration of everything with Irish wit thrown in. Barney Castle is a few miles distant and is located on an elevation overlooking pleasing valleys and sloping wooded hills. The castle walls are four stories high and the Barney stone is within five feet of the top on the outside. One who classes it must be an athlete. There are some caves near the castle that are of considerable interest. One was used at one time for a prison and was closed at the entrance by a strong iron gate or door. Cork has some cathedrals and among them is St. Ann de Shandon. It is famous for its beautiful bells, which chime out in soft, clear tones and reverberate from every hill and dell.

Shandon Bells.

Shandon bells were softly ringing. Near the closing of the day, Their joys of heaven sweetly bringing, As they really seem to say, "Nearer my God to Thee."

And as the people gathered round them, Burdened with life's weal and woe, While the notes of that old anthem Were coming forth in accents slow, "E'en though it be a cross, it raiseth
