

MR. DABNEY WRITES OF TRIP ABROAD

At the entrance to Glenna Bay we stopped at Diana cottage and visited the pretty gardens with many tropical flowers and plants, and the many peculiarly shaped rocks and trees. From here we went to Ross Castle, very interesting old ruins, and here, too, the teams we started with in the morning met and took us to our several hotels.

There are many interesting trips one can make in the vicinity of the Killarney Lakes and one should not overlook a visit to the ruins of Muck Ross Abbey, built in the 14th century.

From Killarney we went to Kingstown, from where we crossed the Irish channel to Holyhead.

Chester was a stopping place of much interest. It is located on the River Dee and has a population of 45,000. Here many remains of Roman occupation may be seen, and at one time it was the frontier fortress against Wales. Much of the old wall is in a good state of preservation.

Some of the principal streets are excavated down many feet below the surface and the roadway is far below the range of stores and shops, over which passengers walk in galleries which they call rows, and on these rows are stores and shops. It is in the upper row that the better class of them can be found. They are curious and access to them is by steps at convenient places. Below the lower of the cells may be seen the old Roman baths. The most of the buildings have ornamental gable fronts, and rows are arched crypts, and in some look very odd. As we wander from one place of interest to another our guide pointed to a house called "God's Providence House," and said it was the only house in the city that escaped the pestilence during the great plague.

We are now walking around on some of the old wall, and have come to Phoenix Towers, which is now used as a small museum, and I read on a tablet near the top of the tower (which is about 20 feet high):

"King Charles stood on the top of this tower Sept. 24th, 1645, and saw his army defeated on Bowton Moor."

From the top of the tower one can see over the beautiful valley and the old castle ruins on the distant hills.

We now pass around to the north gate, which was built more than one hundred years ago. It stands on the foundations of an ancient pile, and underneath about 20 feet below the street level, was the old prison, where the only ventilation was from pipes, and where condemned criminals were kept awaiting execution.

The cathedrals and castle were of much interest. Eaton Hall is a beautiful palace.

Visits Shakespeare's Birthplace.

Stratford is a quaint old city of 15,000. On account of so many tourists, it was impossible to get hotel accommodations, and after a considerable time we procured rooms in the Quartermaster, a private boarding house across the street from the old Shakespeare Grammar School, which is still in operation. The house in which Shakespeare was born is on Henly street, surrounded by small stores and shops, and in entering the house one passes through the living room, floored with unsquared and much worn flagstone, and ascend the oak stairway to the little low ceilinged room where he was born. The ceiling, walls and windows are covered with the names of many noted people, and among them I noticed those of Scott, Carlyle, Byron and many other familiar historic names.

The picture gallery contains many scenes and characters of Shakespearean times. The theatre will seat about 1000 people and the stage is about 50 feet wide and 45 deep, and is open for the performance of the Shakespearean plays during the week in which his birthday occurs and through the tourist season.

The old Trinity Church is a little farther down the street, and in entering it one passes through an avenue floored with flagstone and studded on each side with overhanging lime trees, whose leafy branches occasionally admit streaks of sunshine. The church and the inside adornments are beautiful. In one corner a marble slab marks the resting place of the great poet. The River Avon, apparently un-thousand people of the elite of London and other cities spend the summer there.

From Brighton I went to the quaint old city of Canterbury, which is located on both sides of the River Stour. It is 60 miles from London and seven or eight miles from the sea. It is perhaps one of the oldest cities in England. It is said that its foundation was as far remote as that of Rome. It has withstood the ravages of war and has enjoyed the privilege of peace and plenty. Some of the streets wind and curve around like so many cow trails; some are so narrow that one can almost shake hands with his neighbor across the street from the upstairs window.

The Canterbury Cathedral is certainly an interesting structure, and stands on the site erected by the Romans in the 4th century. Many noted people are buried within its walls. On the western side of the cathedral is the old Norman staircase, untouched except by the hand of time. At one time it led to a large room for the reception of pilgrims.

Only the keep of the old castle and some of the wall that surrounded it can be seen. It is now used for storing coal.

Dover was our next place of interest. It is also a very old, quiet place of 40,000 people, and one of the best fortified cities in Europe. Dover Castle stands on a high hill, overlooking hills, valleys and the beautiful bay. The streets, like those in many other English cities and towns, are winding and narrow.

The harbor is crowded with boats, ships, etc., loading and unloading all kinds of commodities. From here many ships arrive from and depart for foreign countries.

Embark for Belgium.

Here we boarded a Belgian steamer and crossed to Ostend, Belgium, a distance of 66 miles. The water in Dover Straits is very choppy and one is liable to become sick almost before he realizes it. On leaving the English coast the view is splendid, looking back over the blue waters and at the surf dashing up against the white, chalky bluffs whose sward is like emerald, and dotted over with pretty groves and great white mansions.

Immediately on arrival at Ostend all baggage is examined by customs officials. Here we found conditions different from any place we have been. It was almost impossible to find one who could either speak or understand hardly a word of English, and to one unaccustomed to traveling among people who speak a different language it makes them feel quite awkward at times.

Ostend is a beautiful city and very clean. It does quite a commercial business, besides being one of the fashionable seaside resorts of Europe, and more than 100,000 people gather there through the summer season. The sea wall, nearly 40 feet high and 100 feet wide, extends along the beach for miles and forms a good promenade.

The GILBERT IMPLEMENT COMPANY,
Hood River, Oregon--Attention Mr. C. F. Gilbert.

Gentlemen:

The sample of Bean's Arsenate, sent by you a few days ago to this laboratory, has been analyzed by my assistant, Mr. R. H. Robinson, with results as follows:

Moisture	45.57%
Total arsenic oxide (AS2O5)	13.06%
Total lead oxide (PbO)	37.37%
Water soluble lead oxide (PbO)	none
Water soluble arsenic-oxide (AS 2O5)	0.15%

The examination indicates the sample of good quality and the ratio of arsenic oxide to lead oxide indicates that it is a neutral or Ortho lead arsenate.

Trusting these results may be of interest, I am,

Truly yours,
H. V. Tartar
